A TRIP to the MOON.

Prefatory Matter—Remarks on the Ufe and Abufe of Travel—The Ceremony of Banishment—Strictures upon public Executions, &c.

ELLOW - TRAVELLER, according to Promife I have again met you, in order to continue our Tour, and I doubt not but the fame Degree of good Humour, the fame Flow of Spirits, the fame commendable Curiofity on your Side, and the fame friendly Difpolition to gratify it on mine, will render our farther Progrefs both pleafant and profitable.

Before we fet off, however, let me exprefs my Hope that you will not prove Vol. II. A like like a learned and ingenious Critic upon my former VOLUME, who declared a general Approbation of the Matter and Conduct, were it not that he deemed the Afcent of a Mortal to the Moon impracticable: How flender must his Faith be! How liable to Megrims, and incapable of extraordinary Elevation, his Shuttlecock Pericranium ! Let Animals of this groveling Nature, who, formed meerly of Clay, without one animating Spark to lift them above the Sphere of common Attraction, drudge upon their Mother Earth; let them fneer at, or condemn, what they cannot understand, while we, difdaining, like ALEXANDER, to own ourfelves pent within the penurious Limits of one World, range thro' the whole Planetary System: Let Men of Titles and Fortune, without Heads, purfue one fashionable Tract, while we aspire to Climes, Speculations, and Curiofities beyond their Reach.

The

The Advantages of TRAVEL in this nether World (a Branch of Education more followed for Parade than Improvement) have been induftrioufly blazon'd by fome, while the Dangers of it have been as partially difplay'd by others. Without entering upon tedious or intricate Difquifitions, we may reafonably conclude that much valuable and ornamental Knowledge may be deriv'd from vifiting various Countries, if the different Policy and Manners of the feveral States be properly confidered, and their conflitutional or artificial Virtues and Vices impartially furvey'd.

But if Attention, as is too frequently the Cafe, childifhly plays with Trifles, or, under the Influence of Novelty, it dwells upon fuch irrational Enjoyments as flatter unruly and dangerous Paffions; if a Man only learns exceffive Drinking in GERMANY; low Tricking in HOLLAND; Levity in FRANCE; dogmatical Pride in A 2 SPAIN; SPAIN; and lewd Intrigue in ITALY, then were it better to be confined within the narrow Boundaries of one Profpect; for home-bred Follies are lefs awkward and lefs pernicious than foreign Coxcombry: On the reverse, if, properly prepared by Study and a competent Knowledge of our native Land, we collect Military Knowledge from the GERMANS; Œconomy and Affiduity in Business from the DUTCH; Spirit in Conversation, and Ease in Deportment, from the FRENCH; nothing from the SPANIARDS; from the ITALI-ANS, a just and delicate Taste for Music, PAINTING, and ARCHITECTURE, we give Nature all the Affiftance neceffary to make it shine with conspicuous and falutary Luftre.

In our NOIBLAN Progress I dare promise you there is no Danger; for if you part from me no wiser nor better than when we met, you may at least depend upon upon it that you will leave me no worfe; for it is an invariable Maxim with me to appear rather dull and ftoical, than pert at the Coft of Decency, or wife at the Expence of Virtue and Religion: However, tho' bound within fuch unfashionable Limits, tho' I am not fo popular a LUNATIC as to employ my Pen in trifling Memoirs or political Scandal, I hope to produce fuch Matter as will at leaft keep you awake, unlefs you read in Bed, which, by the Bye, I would advife you against; and if I should, as becomes my Name and Family, fometimes ramble beyond the Sphere of general Comprehenfion, fear not, truft me that I shall prove a faithful Guide, and confult your fafe Return with all imaginable Caution.

Thus agreed, Friend Reader, let us, like cordial Acquaintance, fhake Hands. Hold! you fay, not fo free with a Fellow in Malquerade, one whom neither I, A 3 nor [6] nor perhaps any Body elfe knows.-He calls himfelf a KNIGHT, but for ought we can tell he is a KNIGHT of the Post.-You have faid it: Now let me fpeak, and, if it must come to an Examination, inquire whether you know all your Acquaintance: Are none of them in Malquerade? Are they all exactly what they appear to be? If there are Lords among them, have they all real as well as titular Honour? If Ladies, are they diftinguished by domestic Virtues as well as public Rank? If fo, you are a happy Mortal indeed; but let me tell you, Hearts and Tongues, Looks and Thoughts, Words and Actions, Dignity and Worth, Criticism and Knowledge, are, for the most Part, at Variance in this very wife and very virtuous World of ours .--- Very wife and very virtuous ! why not, Sir HUMPHREY, you'll replywhat, I suppose, in the common Place of Satire, you would infinuate ironically that we are much worfe than our Anceftors: that that all Merit must be fought for amidst the Rust of Antiquity, and that our Age is not only the most ignorant, but the most corrupt also; or are you so enthufiastically fond of your favourite Planet, your new-found World, as utterly to contemn the Inhabitants and Productions of this sublunary Sphere?

Soft, foft gentle Reader, you are rather too hafty, tho' kind, in explaining my Ideas; for I take our Age to be adorned with as much Wifdom, Virtue, and Courage as any that ever preceded it, or poffibly any that may be to come; at the fame Time you will give me Leave to fay it is blemifhed with an equal Number of Imperfections, and those arifing from the fame Materials, only in different Shapes, that produced fimilar Imperfections a thousand Years ago; our Manners and Conduct, like our Cloaths,. only [8] only change Names and Fashions, yet are literally the fame; as to the LUNAR RE-GIONS, you will hereafter find that I can look upon them with as impartial an Eye as I do upon the terreftrial ones.-But to return to my Inquiry: I have asked if you know all your Acquaintance; as I love to be free, let me extend the Queftion, and inquire whether you even know YOURSELF ?--- What, filent--- no Anfwer? Why then I may reafonably fuppofe you do not as you ought-for Shame, look at. home-turn your Eyes inwards, first examine your own Heart, then look into the Breafts of your Neighbours; and, from a comparative View of Merits or Failings, learn to value or commiferate your Fellow-Creatures, not according to their Riches or Poverty, but according to their commendable or unworthy Conduct in Life; judge of them not as Solar, Lunar, or Terrestrial Beings, but as CITI-ZENS ZENS of the UNIVERSE, whole expanded Hearts reverence and embrace all the Works of God.

What a tedious dull Moralist, cries every fashionable Reader, is this Sir Hum-PHREY? Probably it is fo; but, that we may be the more agreeable Company, do, good new Acquaintance, only grant me the Indulgence to think me as wife, as witty, as honeft, or, in the more popular Phrafe, as clever a Fellow as yourfelf, and ten to one but you will read with as much Pleafure as I write-thus much to Male Readers. As for the LADIES, I can only follicit their Favour and their Attention by declaring, that a handsome Woman captivates my Eyes; that a fenfible Woman awes my Tongue; and that a GOOD Woman (which three Characters, I dare believe, are united in you, Madam, who are now reading here) ravishes my Heart.

Thus much we have talk'd upon Earth, and modifhly, fo far as Senfe and Fashion can agree, having disjointed Connexion to give a Relifh of Spirit, now let the bold and rapid Wing of full-fledg'd Imagination bear us to the NOIBLAN RE-QUECEX, where, as I remember, we left the good NAMREDAL going to his Noontide Meal; which having paffed over with the ufual Ceremony, my Ears were ftruck with flow and folemn Sounds echoing drowfily thro' the RUVENAL; when looking out I faw a confiderable Number of Perfons approach in awful and deliberate Proceffion, which was led by twelve Men in long Purple-coloured Garments, marching four and four; then fucceeded a Band of Vocal Mufic, fuch as I had heard at the SALMINA, who; in the folemn Paufes of a dead March, chaunted a most affecting Hymn of Sorrow: The Emblems of JUSTICE followed; and after them moved two Females cloathed from Head to Foot

Foot in flowing Sable Robes, their Hair difhevelled and covering their Faces; two Virgins dreffed in White fupported each; then a Train of near one hundred Matrons cloathed in White, and their Heads covered with long Purple Veils, clofed the Proceffion.

This Ceremony was very ftriking; the most profound Silence was observed amidst the attending Crowds, except at ftated Places, when a reverend Citizen read the Crimes and Sentence of the Criminals, and thereby drew forth a general Sigh of Compaffion from the Spectators. One of the Sufferers I found to be the English COUNTESS formerly mentioned; the other unhappy Victim remained quite speechless, as if Conviction and Penitence had feized her Faculties, and lock'd up the Powers of Speech: But her Ladyship retaining the ungovernable, shameless Pride of Terrestrial Quality.

Quality, every now and then exclaimed vehemently—Is this Ufage for a Woman of Rank and Spirit?—O happy ENGLAND, where every Thing is fanctified by Nobility! No Diftinction paid here!—Mon DIEU, what a miserable vulgar World have I got into?—I have heard of HOTTENTOTS, and fure I am among them.

What incorrigible Affurance has that Creature, cried the NAMREDAL, who, after attacking the very Vitals of Female Modefty and filial Piety, dares think her Sentence hard? All thefe and her future Sufferings are juftly due to the Life of unprofitable and licentious Diffipation that fhe led in her former State of Exiftence, exclusive of her infectious Maxims and Example here. The other Criminal, continues he, is fhe whom the Twins contended for; they are now, according to my Sentence, conveying to the VALLEY of WEEPING, and this Proceffion fion is the Ceremony used upon fuch Occasions; those Virgins who support the Exiles are dreffed in White, as an Emblem of their Innocence contrasted with Sable Guilt; the Wives who follow are robed in White also, as Daughters of Virtue, but wear Purple Veils in Token of Sorrow for the difgraceful Fate of their unhappy Sisters.

I own the very decent, rational Solemnity attending this A&t of Juftice impreffed me with a melancholy Pleafure, and I could not help exclaiming to the NAM-REDAL how much Approbation it extorted from me, when compared with the Circumftances that attend a public Punifhment in our World, where unhappy Criminals are purfued and gazed at by unfeeling Crowds, who feem more bent to gratify an inhuman Curiofity, than difpofed to commiferate the unhappy Fate of their Fellow-Creatures. Among the Noi-

NOIBLANS, who are happy enough to know no Crime that reaches Life, a filent, fenfible, fympathetic Concern attends fuffering Guilt; among us even the terrifying Brow of Death cannot prevent a bufy, buftling, indecent Noife; fome few, perhaps, upon fuch awful Occafions, let fall the kindly Dew-Drops of Compassion, and breathe forth the foft Sighs of Pity, while a large Majority indulge the malevolent Spirit of Cenfure, in remarking, that if People won't do right they must fuffer; that it is but fit Examples should be made, tho' not at all affured but that they themfelves, under the fame Impulses of Paffion, imperfect Education, bad Example, Necessities, or Temptations, all which are Misfortunes rather than Crimes, might be found capable of the fame Delinquency they are fo ready to condemn. Juffice, to maintain Property and Order, fhould undoubtedly, among every Rank, fupport her Dignity inviolate, late, and therefore must let fall the Rod of impartial Chastifement upon convicted Guilt, to terrify those into Obedience whom the Charms of conscious Innocence cannot keep within the Pale of Right.

The NAMREDAL having attended to my Remarks, replied, Your Sentiments are perfectly right; when I was on Earth it gave me infinite Surprize and Concern to fee Pleafure oftener expressed at the Miseries than at the Happiness of Humankind; nor could I ever discover the Rise of so unsocial a Satisfaction, unless, perhaps, it may proceed from a falle Imagination, that, while we are anatomizing and censuring the Characters of our Neighbours, we exhibit our own to more Advantage.

How pitiful, how impolitic a Species of Ambition, which deftroys what it feeks for, and cafts an ÆTHIOP Veil over that White-

Whitenefs it would fet forth as clear as the unfpotted Snow? If those who poffefs this pestilential Spirit, more blighting than the Eastern Blast, would but confider the Consequence of indulging it, that the Difgrace or Ruin they meditate for others will most infallibly retort upon themselves, perhaps that ruling Principle, SELF-LOVE, might create a Tendernefs, which Charity and social Obligations recommend in vain.

How fatal have undeferved Afperfions often proved, by urging weak, innocent Perfons into a Contempt of Reputation, than which nothing can be more dangerous to moral or focial Virtue; for what we defpife we always neglect; and to give out Appearances which bear a ftrong Refemblance to Vice, is next to the actual Commiffion of it. But come, continues he, we are dwelling too long upon a Subject more grave than entertaining, what [17] what think you if, by Way of Relaxation, we should take a general View of the City?

I gladly embraced the Propofal, and for that Purpofe attended my kind Conductor to the SALMINA RUVENAL. As we paffed along I could not but express my Surprize that we met fo few People in the Streets; notwithstanding that, from the Numbers I had occasionally feen, the City appeared to be extremely populous.

Your Surprize, fays the NAMREDAL, is natural enough, but it will foon ceafe, when you are informed that no Perfon here traverfes the Streets upon an idle or fuperfluous Occafion; the unavoidable Concerns of mutual Intercourfe alone call People forth here; no Vifiting Cabals, to diffect and pry into the Concerns of neighbouring Families; Hours of Vol. II. B healthful healthful and innocent Recreation are allowed in proper Places adjacent to the City; the ftated and well-known Bufinefs allotted for each Individual takes away those ridiculous Pretences for rambling and purfuing each other, which are fo industrious framed and propagated amongst SUBLUNARS, to the unspeakable Prejudice of their Minds and Circumstances. Among the NOIBLANS the just CECONOMY of TIME is a general and leading Consideration.

CHAP. I.

A Description of the City; its several Parts and Peculiarities—AFuneral—Preparatory Circumstances—The Temples of TIME and DEATH—ROCHESTER and CHARLES II. introduced.

IAVING reached the TEMPLE, we alcended to the Bale of its DOME, from

from whence a diffinct View of the City prefented itself, wherein I perceived the SALMINA and REQUECEX to be the two principal RUVENALS, each of them about half a Mile in Circumference, branching out two Streets, of a Quarter of a Mile in Length, from each Side of the Square; Half-way in every Street appear'd a smaller Square : The Houfes are all uniform, built of a bluish Stone, and piazza'd with white Pillars; no upper Stories, nor are there any Windows, all Light defcending thro' flat Roofs; the Streets may be about fixty Yards wide, with two fmall Rivulets of a Yard broad in each; and in the Center of every Square is a fuperb Fountain of an EMERALD-colour'd Stone, from whence those Rivulets receive a conftant Supply of Water. Thefe, the NAMREDAL observed, were not so much for Ornament as Use; by Means of those fmall Streams, fays he, the Streets are eafily cleanfed from any noxious Matter B 2 that that might grow offenfive, or taint the Air; and upon an Accident of Fire, which however rarely happens, fo immediate and plentiful a Supply of its oppofite Element enables us to reftrain the Mifchief, and put a timely Stop to it. Every Houfe has exactly the fame Portion of Ground allotted to it for Gardening. The MAGISTRATE, affifted by twentyfour CITIZENS, determines regularly at the Seafon what every Family muft plant or fow for the general Stock; and fixes both the Quantity to be furnifhed, and the Time when it is to be brought in.

This Inftitution may appear both fingular and partial, fince fome Subjects of Labour require more Affiduity, and are attended with much more Trouble and Fatigue than others: In fuch Cafes an equivalent Advantage is allowed; but to defcend into Particulars would be too tedious, and muft divert your Attention from what what you will find more agreeable: Come, let us afcend higher, that you may not only command a better Prospect of the City, but also of the adjoining Territory. We afcended, and a most enchanting Profpect open'd on my View; extensive Lawns, beautified with vernal Smiles, and interfected by the flow flately Windings of a majeftic River; fkirting Woods in different Forms and Situations, and terminating Hills, delightfully irregular, entertain'd the Eye with an inimitable Scene of rural Elegance and Pleafure. What you now behold, fays the NAMRE-DAL, is a Miniature Sketch of the whole Island, just as we of NODNOL are a small Sample of the Inhabitants, except those of NEROMA and OMYRCHAL, both which deferve a particular Defcription; but I intend you shall fee them.

Having fufficiently contemplated the Beauties that furrounded us, we defcend-B 3 ed, ed, and I asked my Conductor whether the Climate of NOIBLA was steady as well as ferene, or whether it admitted fuch frequent and violent Changes as certain Seafons produce among us: No, replied he, the Elements here are an Emblem of that Tranquillity which prevails among the Inhabitants; we have no greater Alteration than what you have feen; no Tempefts ever whirl their Devastation here; we have no Thunder to alarm us; no Lightning to blaft us; no Floods of Rain to fweep away the Fruits of the Earth: We know nothing of the Severities either of Cold or Heat; temperate Breezes cool and purify the Air, refreshing Dews moiften and fertilize the Soil, and we have all the Bleffings of a perpetual Spring: Whatever Industry can procure, whatever Prudence would purfue, or Contentment can fupply, is found in this mild and happy Region, where the natural-born NOIBLANS ufually enjoy about a hundred hundred Years of Life, free from all internal and external Pain, unlefs they bring it on themfelves by fome Inadvertence of their own. As to those who have been translated here from Earth, their Duration is uncertain-while they remain they appear in the fame matured Form they wore in the SUBLUNARY WORLD, without any perceptible Increase of Years or Decline of Conftitution. Now that we have touched, continued he, upon Mortality, it may prove a ufeful Gratification of your Curiofity to fee a FUNERAL according to the Manner of this ISLAND, and the Circumstances preparatory to it, which, I dare believe, will appear fomewhat extraordinary to you.

Having acknowledged that nothing could be more worthy of my Attention, we proceeded to a Houfe from whence iffued loud Sounds of Mufic and triumphant Chorufes of Joy; many Perfons dreffed dreffed in gay or rather antic Habits, and crowned with Garlands, flood before the Entrance, difplaying magnificent Banners, ornamented with Variety of Hieroglyphics.

Behold, fays my Guide, the Manfion of DEATH. Perceiving me to be furprized at the Appearance of fuch Festivity, he told me it was intended as a Compliment to the dying Perfon, who is fupposed thereby to have Spirits infused, to bear up against the Weakness of Nature, and to render the Satisfaction of being fo near his Removal to a better State of Existence more sensible. This Point being cleared up, I yet remained under another Difficulty; I could not account for it that a Number of People fhould be affembled to attend the Funeral of a Perfon not yet dead; however, the NAMREDAL informed me that an Hour would clear up the whole Matter; for, fays fays he, the FINAL EXPERIMENT has been made, and the old Man, tho' not quite dead, is most certainly not far from breathing his last.

I here afked what was meant by the FINAL EXPERIMENT, and was inftructed, that when, from Age and Weaknefs, any Perfon is fuppofed to be upon his Death-Bed, one of the GARDEN-BIRDS is brought into the Room; if it tamely flies towards him, Death is not near; but if it flutters about with Noife and Screaming, then his End is inevitably at Hand.

I was by this Time conducted into a Chamber, where I faw the Victim half fet, half laid on a rich Couch under an elegant Canopy, with the Muficians ranged on each Side of him: Soon after our Entrance the feftive Strains we had heard were gradually lull'd into Silence, when a young Man of noble Deportment, proftrating ftrating himfelf before the dying Perfon, fpoke as follows :

" Tender and benevolent Parent, kind and faithful Guardian of our younger Years, let not this unavoidable Separation from the immediate Society of your Children and Friends, totally deprive us of your paternal Care and Affection; when thy Spirit shakes off its material Fetters, Oh condescend to supervise our Conduct, and to direct our Courfe; whifper into our Minds whatever may be needful to a blameless Existence here; pour the Balm of temperate Defire and calin Contentment into our Souls; be thou the kind Conveyance of the Bleffings that are allotted for us by our UNIVERSAL FA-THER, and when we stand upon the Verge of Time, bring us fome Beams of heavenly Radiance to cheer our Way, and to light us thro' the gloomy Vale of Death."

This

This Addrefs was received with a Countenance full of the fincereft Refpect and the tendereft Affection, which immediately broke forth in the following Reply:

"Son of my Care, and you other Children of my deareft Love, doubt not the Influence and Protection of my fympathizing Spirit; the Pinions of the Morn fhall bear me to affift you, and even on the fable Wing of Night I'll hover to protect you: Yet place not too much Confidence in fupernatural Affiftance, exert your own Faculties to the moft worthy Purpofes, fo fhall my Guardian Care be the more effectual, and your Heavenly Father will be more difpofed to grant me the Power of protecting and of bleffing you."

This I found was a Cuftom among the NOIBLANS, arifing from a traditional Opinion,

Opinion, that the Spirits of departed Perfons are invefted with the Superintendance of their furviving Friends, and that, without fuch Guardians, the immaterial Agents of Vice and Confusion would deftroy all Virtue and focial Order.

Soon after this Piece of Religious Ceremony, the old expiring NOIBLAN demanded of the NAMREDAL who I was; when, being told that I came from the SUBLUNAR WORLD, he feemed much pleafed, as fuppofing me to have undergone fomewhat fimilar to that great Change which he himfelf was about to experience; however, being fet right in this Point, I was moved, by his hofpitable Reception, to offer Condolance on his approaching Diffolution, after the Manner ufual with us upon fuch Occafions.

"What, replied he, viewing me with an Eye of ftern Regard, have I ever done to provoke.

provoke thy Ill-will, that thou fhouldft mourn, like an Enemy, at the most fortunate Period of my Life, my fecond and more glorious Birth? Nature, thou feeft, haft accomplished her End, and is now brought to the last Ebb : TIME has dried up the Springs of Action, and I have nought remaining of my former Self, but a Remembrance of the Faculties I once poffeffed; which, like the Breath I have drawn, are faded into nothing; and canft thou, unprovok'd, wifh me to totter about longer, wearifome to myfelf, and burthenfome to others? I have heard, Son of EARTH, that the Monster ENVY is very prevalent in thy World; does it reach even to the Border of the Grave, and extend fo far as to deny the weary, worn-out Traveller his hard-earn'd Reft?"

"Venerable Sir, I replied, DEATH is a Confummation, which, tho' effential to Nature, and common to all, every Man, wifhes wifhes to his Neighbour before himfelf; a Period the Aged fhun, and tremble at as much as Youth; however temporal Poffeffions may be coveted, this defirable Change is induftrioufly avoided by all; the Pride of Beauty, Riches, Fame, and Grandeur, fhrinks before it; and the Impreffion it makes is fo awful, that Survivors, not content to vent their Grief in the natural Expression of it, carry the Semblance of their inward Sorrow for their departed Friends even in their Drefs and whole outward Appearance."

"Oh Fools! Fools! Fools! returned he, if they are fo afraid to die, how comes it they are not afraid to live, one being as unavoidable as the other, and the natural Confequence of it? Far hence be removed fuch irrational Timidity; while I at this blifsful Moment, with you my Children, Fellow CITIZENS and Friends, who muft all in due Time experience the fame fame eligible Separation, rejoice that I have been placed in a World whofe Inhabitants live with Contentment and die with Composure; where, without yielding to the unprofitable Weakness of childish Grief, we take Leave of the Departing as fetting out upon a pleafant Journey; where we lie down in the cold Arms of Death with as much Tranquillity as in the nightly Repofe of Nature; lie down! nay, meet with Joy our kind Reliever; where that felf-tormenting Raven, a guilty Confcience, never preys upon the Heart, nor croaks Defpair unto the Dying :- But hold, my impatient Spirit fprings forward towards Libertythro' thefe failing Eyes I fee the NAL-SINA, attended by my venerable Anceftors, approach; his heavenly Voice charms my Ear-and lo-he fpreads the fnowy Wings of Mercy to bear me from Imperfection and Infirmity to immortal Blifs."

Here,

Here, fainting in a Kind of enthufiaftic Extacy, the attending AVOZEN proceeded immediately to a ftrange, and, in my Sight, inhuman Operation, no other than that of feparating the old Man's Head from his Body. The fmall Quantity of Blood which iffued, was carefully receiv'd by his eldeft Son into a Chryftal Receptacle.

After this the Corpfe, having undergone a very ceremonious Ablution, and being furnifhed with an artificial Head, fo nicely formed and judicioufly colour'd, as hardly to be diftinguifhed from the natural one, was arrayed in moft magnificent Attire, and, being feated in a Triumphal Carriage, was conducted, with great Pomp and Joy, to the NESOVA RENNAM, the FIELD of DEATH, about two Miles from the City, a Place of much rural Beauty, near four Miles in Circumference, fenced by a large Dyke ten Yards wide, wide, and ornamented by two elegant Buildings placed on opposite Hills at the Extremities of a Grove, awfully delightful; one of those Edifices is a TEMPLE dedicated to TIME, called, in NOIBLA, RINMETHOL, the ACCOMPLISHER; the other to DEATH, stiled LARDETHAC, the DELIVERER.

At our Entrance into the Field, the Corpfe was met by fome PRIESTS belonging to the TEMPLE of TIME, and conducted thither by them; where, being placed before a large Statue of a human Figure, thick fet with Wings, and wearing a magnificent Crown, all who attended the Funeral proftrated themfelves, while the ALMAZET fpoke as follows:

"Behold, Oh great Accomplisher, at thy Shrine, the perifhable Part of a deceas'd Brother, who, during the Exiftence of this material Body, profeffed himfelf Vol. II. C thy thy faithful Servant, nor ever vainly lavished any of the Moments appointed for moral or focial Purposes; by us, his Survivors, he follicits that honourable Stamp of Approbation upon his Memory, which may encourage his Posterity perseveringly to imitate his commendable Application; pronounce him a worthy Sacrifice made to thee by the Great DELIVERER, and fill our Hearts with Joy."

Here, as I prefume, by a Kind of mechanical Influence, the Statue three Times flapp'd all its Wings, and thrice utter'd a Sound refembling that of a deep howling Wind; upon which the Children and Relations of the Deceas'd fung a fhort Hymn of Rejoicing, and then moved in a most extravagantly antic Form of Dancing, which done, we paffed on to the other TEMPLE; at one End appeared a Skeleton of enormous Size, feated on a Throne, with the Emblem of Power

Power, proftrate, fupporting one Foot, and that of Grandeur the other.

At the Foot of the Throne was an Altar with Fire upon it, into which the Head and Blood of the deceas'd Perfon were thrown: I asked the Reason of this, and was told that the NOIBLANS believed Fire to be the parental Element, and Origin of all created Matter; that they fupposed the Spirit, during its temporal Existence, to refide in the Parts that were now devoted to the holy Flames; which, as they separated and purified it from the groffer Particles with which it was connected, were deemed the propereft Conveyance to an undefiled State of Immortality.

After this, and a few fhort Thankfgivings, the Body was let down into a round Hole, three Feet Diameter and twelve or fourteen deep. A Hymn con-C 2 cluded cluded the whole Ceremony; when, according to Cuftom, the artificial Head was, by the eldeft Son, conveyed home with much Care and Reverence; fuch Memorials, or Semblances of the Dead, being held in high Veneration.

On our Return I afked the NAMRE-DAL if any other Ufe was made of the TEMPLE of TIME; to which he replied, that a LECTURE on the ECONOMY of that most useful and elusive Appendage of Mortality, was delivered there once a Month; when the Inhabitants of one SE-NIRAT, or WARD, that is a twelfth Part of the City, are obliged to attend; and if any have, fince a former Meeting, knowingly omitted any Duty, or an Opportunity of doing Good, fuch Perfons are obliged to make an open Acknowledgement of their Failure, with a folemn Promife that their Offence shall not be repeated under fevere Penalties, which in fuch Cafes certainly take Place.

In this Point there never was an Inftance known of Mifreprefentation; which is not only owing to a general Deteftation of Falfhood, but alfo to the Belief that TIME is an abfolute Agent, capable of Perception; and that the Figure which reprefents it in the TEMPLE, would by its Influence be animated to point out Deceit. A Notion however extravagant, like Prieftcraft, not without Ufe.

You will poffibly be furprized, continues he, to hear that the ALMEZAT, or Father of the TEMPLE, is no other than the famous JOHN Earl of ROCHE-STER. That Station being vacant fome fhort Time after his Tranflation hither, feveral Candidates appear'd for it; among the reft EPICTETUS, who feemed to command moft Approbation, as having, even in a toilfome and fervile State of Dependence, ferupuloufly appropriated his few Hours of Leifure, or rather of needful C_3 Reft,

Reft, to the most commendable Pursuits, those of Virtue and Knowledge: His Claim, modestly preferred and sensibly supported, was on the Point of taking Place, when the present Possesson and addresed an unexpected Candidate, and addresfed our Citizens to the following Purpose:

"Encouraged—Oh NOIBLANS—by Candor and Impartiality, those lovely Characteristics of this happy Island, I present myself before you; not as presuming upon superior Abilities, but from a Defire of extenuating, by Strictness and Affiduity, the Errors of my former Existence.

"Here let me own — with Shame let me own, that, while on Earth, I had ample Means and frequent Opportunities to confer Happiness on others, and Honour on myself; I had Fortune to command every every Thing defirable but Content; Genius to furnish Improvement and Delight; with Reafon to correct my Paffions, and hereditary Honours to enforce Refpect; -yet, alas! to what did I convert thefe fignal Advantages? My Abundance ferved only as a Float to bear me down the rapid and dangerous Stream of Pleafure; my Genius, like an alluring poifon-pregnant Flower, difplayed its Beauties only to infect those who admir'd it; my Reafon poorly turned a Pandar to my Vices; and debafed Nobility funk me into Pity, or Contempt, with all the Senfible and Judicious.

"Such, SAGE-CITIZENS, was your Suppliant, till a providential Visitation called his Senfes to their just Order, and showed in a true, but agonizing, Light, the perilous Path he had trod. Full of that powerful Conviction, even now with the dark and terrifying Retrospect ever in my View, View, my Feelings of the Mifapplication of TIME must be stronger, and my Sense of the lamentable Consequences of it more forcible than theirs, whom Prudence and natural Inclinations have made Œconomists of Time; if any Objection should. arife from my Youth, fince I have fcarce paffed the Meridian of terrestrial Existence, let it be noted that tho' I did with great Rapidity run thro' an Age of vicious Diffipation, yet I have fince most painfully experienced a long and bitter Age of Repentance; and EXPERIENCE, not Years, teaches WISDOM. For the reft, I shall gladly submit to your Determination, with one fhort Remark for my Conclusion, That comparative Knowledge and establish'd Penitence, are rather more to be relied on, than philosophical Speculation and yet untainted Virtue."

This Address feemed to have confiderable Influence; yet I believe it would not have have prevailed but for the voluntary, modeft Refignation of EPICTETUS in his Favour. He has fince gained great Credit in his Station; on all Occafions he difplays the most eminent Ability; one Inftance out of many I shall give you.

When CHARLES the SECOND of ENG-LAND refigned his terrestrial Crown, he. brought with him a full Flow of his former Spirits and Inclinations; which, for fome Space, ran him into Difficulties and Difgrace: Upon his first Examination at the SALMINA RINMETHOL, his Account of himfelf appeared most trifling and unfatisfactory; however, being fortified with a Confidence ufually attending fuch Characters, and recognizing his former gay, diffolute Companion and Subject, he fhook off all Concern, and addreffed himfelf to the ALMEZAT, with a sprightly Negligence, to the following Effect :

"Who, in the Name of common Senfe, JACK ROCHESTER, would have thought to find you in fuch a Character? What, make a Prieft of one who hated Priefts as much as I did! and fet him up to preach. of TIME, who never thought of any but the Time prefent! a mighty odd World we have got into this, where a Man must tell all he does; nay, not only Man, but Woman alfo. Heavens! my Friend, what would fuch an Inftitution have done upon Earth when we were there? What a gloomy Cloud would it have caft over the Sunshine of Wit and Gallantry, in which bright Region I was myfelf the leading Star? But why need I repeat what muft fo ftrongly dwell upon your Recollection; be it enough to fay, that having you, my Friend, for a Judge, I must stand acquitted of all Error, in regard of fome little amorous Sallies, and fome other Steps towards Politeness; fince a Person of the high Rank I held, cannot in Reafon fon be expected to enter into fo low and mechanical a Disposition of Hours as the vulgar Customs of this unpolish'd ISLAND feem to enjoin."

"How strange-Oh CHARLES-replied the ALMEZAT, have been thy Notions, how irregular thy Practices? Not the immediate Hand of Heaven visiting thy unfortunate Father in Blood; not feveral imminent Dangers and Hair-breadth Escapes of thy own Person; not Obscurity, Exile, nor the fevereft Rod of Adverfity, could teach thee to make a commendable Ufe of that Power to which thou wast fo providentially reftored : Placed in the confpicuous and flippery Station of political Parent to a brave, free People, what engroffed thy Attention? Didft thou felect, not regarding Men but their Capacities, able and faithful Counfellors? No-thy Ministers were, in general, a Set of Knaves or Fools; weak, or or wicked Tools themfelves, who made a Tool of thee. Didft thou plan patriot Schemes, or patronize them? No-all thy Schemes and Devices were to obtain Sums fufficient for the Support of Prodigality and Paffions, not only below a King, but even below the meaneft Rank of human Nature. Waft thou a commendable Example in domeftic Life? No-thy numerous Concubines, those Leeches of the State, to countenance their own splendid Infamy, turned Modesty out of Doors, and rendered Vice fafhionable. From thefe, and fimilar Circumstances, thy Term of Government became a Scene of Perturbation at home, and Contempt abroad. A Tide of Infection flowed from thy Court to corrupt the Manners of thy People; bloated Debauch ftalked uncontrouled and blufhlefs in the broad Eye of Day, while Religion and Virtue retir'd desponding in unfrequented Shades. · An unhappy Profelyte to thee, how, how, alas! did I abufe my Station and Nature? Actuated by a polite Delirium, I made TIME a Slave to Irregularity; but muft Folly triumph ever? Will not Change of Exiftence work a Change in thee? Hence, and know that, till thou haft renounced thy former Self, I fhall difclaim all Knowledge of thee; and, as Father of this TEMPLE, if at the next Examination thou art not better prepared, if thou doft not learn and practife thofe Golden Precepts, to know and rule Thyfelf, I fhall fentence thee to a Punifhment fuited to fuch irrational Obftinacy."

This fevere, yet juft Reproof, which met with general Applause from the Noi-BLANS, feemed to have no other Effect upon CHARLES than to raise fome Sneers of Ridicule; for which, and his obstinate Perseverance in his Irregularities, he was fentenced to the Office he now fills, of RANEVER, or VERGER in the TEMPLE.

Here

Here I could not avoid expressing a warm Approbation of the Inftitution the NAMREDAL had been explaining-Oh that fuch a Temple and fuch a periodical Examination, exclaimed I, were eftablished on EARTH, then would not Scandal find Leilure to prey, Vulture-like, upon defenceless Characters, nor Gaming Opportunities to fasten its unrelenting Talons upon the Vitals of fuffering Families; Indolence and Procrastination would be roufed from their Lethean Slumbers; Fraud and Envy would be chained in their unhallowed Cells; Oppression's Iron Hand would be unnerved; Skame and Guilt would hide themfelves in the thick Gloom of Night; while the rofe-lipp'd Cherub Innocence fmiled Peace upon the World.

These and fuch-like Observations employed us till we reached the NAMRE-DAL's House; at the usual Hour we retired to our several Chambers. This Night

Night again Reflection preceded, and for fome Time prevented Slumber; however, I became fuddenly fo naturalized to my new Refidence, that I could almost have given up all Defire of re-visiting the EARTH, which had ever appeared to me in the Light of a perilous Seat of Perturbation, imperfect Enjoyments, and multiplying Cares; but much more fo when I now compared it with the mild, unruffled Region 1 had reached: However, when I confidered this unvarying State of Existence, I found it very ill calculated for the active Spirit of a Sublunar, and determined within myfelf, that Tranquillity among the NOIBLANS was little more than mental Indolence; that their Philosophy confisted in a total, and therefore prejudicial, Suppression of the Paffions, which are the fole Springs of Action in the Soul; and that their Virtue confifted not fo much in refifting, as in preventing Temptation. With thefe Sentiments timents came the drowfy Power that knits up the ravelled Sleeve of Care, and lock'd up my Senfes in Repofe; Reader, if you be thus difpofed yourfelf; if, from Wearinefs of Spirits, or the Tedioufnefs of this Narration, he has touched thy Eyelids with his Leaden Wand; or if, for any other Reafon, thou may'ft be inclined to paufe, I fhall gratify thee with a convenient Opportunity by concluding the CHAPTER.

CHAP. II.

Some Account of the NOIBLAN Opinion concerning DREAMS, SPIRIT, MATTER, &c. carried to the TOIRTAZAN of the SUBLUNARS—HELIOGABALUS, THE. CIBBER, JAMES I. JOE MILLER, and many other remarkable Characters exhibited.

A T Breakfast, next Morning, the NAMREDAL inquired concerning my Rest, and being informed that vifionary fionary, romantic Dreams had fomewhat difturbed me; then, fays he, your Spirit, according to the Opinion of NOIBLA, has taken Flight on the Wing of occafional Liberty. Requesting to be a little better informed of this Notion, he proceeded thus:

"You must know that the Soul of Man is here believed to be an Emanation of Divinity; that tho' it acts in Conjunction with the Body, yet it is totally independent of it; that it is immortal and unceafing in its Operations; fo fubtle of Effence, as to elude the Power of human Perception or Defcription; that, like the Sun-Beams, it pervades and enlightens. furrounding Matter: The Body is confifidered as a beautiful harmonious Piece of Mechanifm, miraculoufly composed of gross Materials, and utterly perishable in its Nature; that it is but a paffive Ma-VOL. II. D chine.

chine, calculated for the Reception and Influence of those amazing Faculties which are annexed to human Ntaure; and that all Sensation absolutely resides in the Spirit, not the Limbs of Man.

"This Opinion they defend by remarking, that tho' the Body of a deceas'd Perfon retains materially the fame external Appearance, no Impression can give it either Pleafure or Pain; that tho', from particular Accidents, as a Wound or Fracture, the corporal Parts feem to caufe difagreeable or tormenting Ideas, yet the original Senfation is in the Mind, which becomes diffurbed and agitated according to the Degree of Violence offered to its Refidence, or any Part thereof.----Many Circumstances, which wound the Mind, leave the Limbs unhurt; but there is no Impreffion, external or internal, which does not affect the Spirit.

" Pof-

[5I]

" " Poffeffed by these Notions, they believe Sleep to be an unavoidable and neceffary Relaxation for the perifhable Parts; but deny the Spirit to have any the least Share in that death-like Semblance; and affirm that, while the Body continues in this Condition, the Soul, enlarged from its mortal Incumbrance, flies abroad upon the Wings of Thought, encountering, viewing, and difcuffing various Points as at other Seafons. This unconnected State of Action is called REN-MULZABA, or DREAMING; and Dreams, fay they, are fometimes recollected and fometimes blotted from the Table of Memory, according to the fympathetic Impreffions they make. As to any prognoflicative Inferences deriv'd from thefe Extravaganzas of the Soul, they are held in utter Contempt, except by fome credulous SUBLUNARS, who, having dreamed away their former State of Exiftence, chuse to flick by their favourite Notions, Do and and derive from Shadows, imaginary Bleffings or Misfortunes.

"Obferve, continues he, that in making you acquainted with the NOIBLANS, I do not at all mean to impofe their Manners and Opinions in general upon you; they are only candidly fubmitted to your own Choice and Determination, to be communicated by you with the fame Freedom on EARTH, fhould they feem either ufeful or entertaining."

I thanked my kind Inftructor, and replied, That his Condefcention was more than I could expect; that I had yet perceived nothing of evil Tendency; and that I thould have been particularly glad to enter into a more enlarged Difquifition of the Connexion fubfilting between Spirit, or Effence, and Matter; but that fo much had been already faid without any tolerable Illustration of the Subject, unmeaning meaning Diffinctions, and indeterminate Refinements, had been fo voluminoufly multiplied, all ending in a Chaos of Metaphyfical Confusion, that I would not attempt to prolong Difcourfe upon a Theme fo inextricable, and perhaps, if clearly unravelled, profitlefs.

" I am perfectly of your Opinion, fays the NAMREDAL; there is a great and fufficient Variety of useful, comprehensible Speculations to employ the Mind; who then, uncompelled by Madnefs, would wander in the Perils of Darknefs, when he might have the Safe-Conduct of Light; or truft himfelf to the Horrors of tempeftuous Seas and faithless Shores without a Compass, when so certain a Guide as RELIGION lies within his Power? But a Truce with this fententious Matter: You have had fince your Arrival in the ISLAND very little but Subjects of grave Reflection, it may not be amifs to offer you fome D 3 Scenes Stenes of a fprightlier, tho' not less ufeful, Nature, for this Purpofe I'll introduce you to a TOIRTAZAN, or weekly Meeting, with which all the SUBLUNARS in NOD-NOL are indulged; and, as no naturalborn NOIBLAN is admitted, they may talk of what Subject, and with what Freedom, they pleafe. In this, as in all terreftrial mix'd Societies, you will perceive an odd, incongruous Medley of. good Senfe, Pertnefs, Contradiction, Vanity, Envy, Emulation, and Abfurdity."

Being conducted to the ARESMA, or HALL of the SUBLUNARS, the NAMRE-DAL, for the Convenience of hearing and feeing unperceived, led me into a private Gallery, where I was confiderably ftruck, not only with the real Dignity which appeared in many Characters, but that extraordinary Variety which ran thro' the whole; a Variety of which nothing can give fo just an Idea of as our Masquerades rades; the Revolutions of Fashion in scveral Climes and Ages were here difplayed at large; fome fweeping with long Robes, like Peacocks in their Pride; others skipping in short Doublets, like trimm'd Fighting-Cocks; fome with cropp'd Hair, others with voluminous Wigs; fome with whifking Beards, others with fmooth Chins. Among the Females, of whom there appear'd a confiderable Number, the Diffinctions of Drefs appear'd more numerous and fantastical than those of the Men. The Hour of Conversation not being come, I filled up the Time, after taking a strict Review of the Figures, with inquiring of the NAMREDAL after fome Particulars that ftruck me, and had my Curiofity thus gratified:

"That Perfon, fays he, who fits among the Men, though dreffed in Women's Cloaths, is our FIRST CHARLES, who bears the Difgrace of those Female Garments, ments, for having tamely given up the Prerogatives both of KING and MAN to the shallow and pernicious Influence of his QUEEN: A Piece of Weaknefs which multiplied his Cares while alive, ftained his Fame when translated from Earth, and now fubjects him to the Ridicule of all his Brother Monarchs here. The Figure next to him, on his Right Hand, is that very odd Mixture of a Man, his Father, who is condemn'd to wear the Habit of a Jack Pudding, with the Figure of a Witch on a Broom hung round his Neck, in Difgrace of his defcending fo far beneath the Royal Character, as to countenance low Jefting, mean Quibbles, infignificant Puns, and the most inconfistent Notions of Witchcraft: That gravelooking Woman on the oppofite Side"here a Signal being given for opening the Affembly, my Inftructor was interrupted by a Debate between HELIOGABALUS, the ROMAN EMPEROR, and THEOPHI-

LUS CIBBER, the ENGLISH COMEDIAN, both of luxurious Memory.

The latter of thefe two moft valuable Perfonages, adjusting himfelf with a true Lord FOPPINGTON Air, and all that frothy Pertnefs which fo remarkably diftinguissed him on Earth, addressed the voracious Monarch in Manner following:

" It is odd, very odd, my dear Sir, that, notwithftanding the Tendre I have always had for you, we can never be intimately acquainted; it was ever my Rule to like an honeft Fellow, fplit me; befides, you know, my dear Sir, whatever we were in the other World, we are all upon a Footing here; and though, entre nous, I hate this Place as much as you can do, I fhall enter into a Comparison of our former State of Existence.—To begin then: In ROME, for a short Time, you played the Part of a real EMPEROR, hated by MilMillions; in ENGLAND I have often exhibited a mimic one, loved by allbut my Creditors .---- You admired fine Cloaths, fo did I-good Eating, fo did Ihandfome Wenches, ftap my Vitals, fo did I-You was thrown into the TIBER by the PRÆTORIAN Band, I into the Sea 'by a Storm, and here, at length, we have met in statu quo-there's a fair Parallel, fplit me."-" A Parallel! replies the Imperial Cormorant, with a Sneer of Contempt; what, a Tinfel Mimic, a paltry Shadow, compare himfelf with HE-LIOGABALUS, whole Magnificence and Tafte stretched both Art and Nature to their utmost Bent! Poor, vulgar Reptile, formed but of common Clay, haft thou not heard of my Purple Robes adorned with Gems? my Arabian Balms, my Golden Veffels, my Rooms ftrewed with Saffron; fix hundred Oftriches at a Supper; the Tongues of Peacocks, Singing-Birds, and innumerable other fumptuous Articles ticles, to the Amount of more in one Meal than fuftained the whole Expence of thy paltry Life from Beginning to End; and, after this, dareft thou prefume to mate with me, vile Plebeian?"

"Hold, hold, replies the Son of THEspis, if we must come to a close Comparifon, pray, who did most according to our Capacities? We had both the fame Game in View; who most warmly purfued the Chace? You, my dear Sir, had the whole ROMAN EMPIRE to live on, I my Wits alone-You never wore Cloaths twice, I could not change fo often, yet some English Taylors found me ready enough that Way-You had no Bailiffs to fear, I often felt their griping Paws, vet ftill kept on my Courfe, and obey'd Fafhion as critically as any of my Contemporaries; nor did I fall fhort in the delicate Science of refined Eating, witnefs, Oh glorious Remembrance! the many Turtles

Turtles I have helped to demolifh; the Haunches of Venison, Westphalia Hams consuma, Beef Marinate, Mutton a la Mercorance, Lamb a la Conte, Tongues Espagnole, Pullets a la Royale, Chickens a la Reine, Ortolans, Musbrooms au Blanc, Cardons a la Bejamel, Blomanges, Marbrays, &c. &c. &c." During this Rhapfody of Dainties I could perceive the Difputants alternately lick their Lips with much Eagerness; for the ROMAN, tho' he knew not the frenchified Viands mentioned, yet, like BONIFACE in regard of Latin, he thought they must be good by the Sound, from whence a friendly Sympathy touched his Breaft; and, upon the HISTRIONIC Hero's adding, as a conclufive Proof of his own fpirited Appetite, that once, not having a fingle Shilling in his Pocket, he went into a Coffee-Houfe, push'd a bold Front, there with some Difficulty borrowed a Guinea, and immediately laid the whole out upon a Pint of green green Peas, a Duck, and a Bottle of Claret. HELIOGABALUS warmly embraced him, declared future Friendship, and promised that, if any Change should make him an EMPEROR again, THEOPHILUS should certainly be appointed PRIME MINISTER: But this Post, from a Knowledge of it in ENGLAND, the new Favourite declined, and proposed himself for the more peaceable Employ of STEWARD of the HOUSHOLD, having, as he faid, more Liking to Cooks than Politicians, and was accordingly nominated to that most noble Post.

Here a thin, cogitative Figure rifing up, faid, That if Philofophy could at any Time give up Patience, it must be to kear fuch irrational and infignificant Contentions; behold a Couple of Creatures, cries he, in the human Form, taking all imaginable Pains to render one another contemptible; nay, warmly emulating each each other in the Race of Infamy: One glories in guzzling the Revenues of an Empire that was curfed with his Sway, the other boafts of fwallowing whole Families of honeft Tradefmen, who were credulous enough to truft him. Wretched Infatuation, to take that for Merit which Reason totally condemns; Reason, which points out Moderation and Competence as the Summum Bonum of Life, justly towering above the transitory Grandeur and fuperfluous Luxuriance of the nether World; which, ripened into Wifdom, confiders no Treasure as of equal Value with the Riches of the Mind, and declares that every Man poffess ample Means of Happiness within himself.

Here a jovial Figure, blooming with focial Eafe and Pleafantry of Countenance, feated at fome Diftance, interrupted the Moralift, crying out, "Who tries Patience now, Mafter SENECA? Are not you you a pretty Fellow, of all Men, to talk at this Rate? I won't contradict your Principles in general, becaufe I begin to think fomething that Way myfelf; but, Compliments apart, why fhould you be fo fevere? Of the two, an Eating Fool is more pardonable than an Hypocritical Knave; the first shews himself, and meets double Punishment, hurting both Constitution and Character; the latter, like a gilded Snake, carries Poifon under an alluring Appearance: Those Persons you fo feverely tax have Strength of Paffion and Weaknefs of Judgment to plead in their Excufe; while you, well knowing what was right, wrote indeed according to that Knowledge, yet acted upon Principles diametrically oppofite: You recommended Competence and Moderation, with Plaufibility and Zeal; yet, with the Spirit of an Ufurer, you accumulated the most enormous Sums. Who raifed more fumptuous Villas than the humble humble SENECA? Who lent out Money upon more exorbitant Intereft than this very Moralist? Who, to feed the devouring Jaws of Avarice, ever bred fuch a Plague for the human Race as you did in your Pupil NERO? Vicious as that Monfter might have been by Nature, honefter Instruction would have made him much better; however the Temper, which your Thirst of Gain and Fear of lofing Favour caufed you to indulge in him, at length grew outrageous, and, like an ill-tam'd wild Beaft, fell on its Keeper, emptying your Bags of their Money, and your Veins too of their Blood.——That fuch may be the Fate of every fycophantic Preceptor of Royalty, who, to ingratiate or aggrandize himfelf, facrifices the future Happiness of a Nation, is the fanguine Wifh of EPICURUS."

At this Period the antic Monarch JAMES rofe up, and expressed himself thus: "Well, well, Master Philosopher, fay fay what you like, ECONOMY is a very good Thing; not becaule the Word is of Greek Derivation, but because A Penny faved is a Penny gained. Though I know this Proverb can't found well to fuch a Ventriculator, a Belly-Man and Wine-Bibber, from the Latin Verb bibo, to drink, as you were; now, that you may give the greater Credit to what I fay, you must know when I was KING of GREAT-BRITAIN-(a Name of my own Invention for SCOTLAND and ENGLAND) they used to fay I was a wife one-a second So-LOMON-tho' I am told, when they could no longer get any Thing by me, they changed their Tune-for among them, as the Proverb fays-No longer pipe, no longer dance .- But I suppose the Reason of their finding Fault is, becaufe I was too good a Chriftian to quarrel, and, if I had received a Slap upon one Cheek, would have turn'd the other rather than fhed Blood: Nor was this for Want of VOL. II. E Courage,

[66]

Courage, for tho' I was not fo mad-headed as to draw my Sword in Defence of what fome Fools call National Glory, yet I did a bolder Thing with my Pen, when I tickled off thole Imps of the Devil, Witches and Warlocks-many an eviley'd old Wife was finged between the Fingers with Brimstone Matches in my Reign-but Tempora mutantur-I'm only laugh'd at here.-Poor BUCKINGHAM, as handsome a Fellow as ever was made a Lord—if I had him with me—tho' he led my Son CHARLEY a Wild-Goofe Chace into SPAIN, and caufed all EUROPE to make a Jeft of us, it would be fome Comfort; even that poor Rogue SHAKESPEAR, who used to pun fo curiously for whole Pages together in my Tafte, and introduced the Weiard Sifters into his MAC-BETH to pleafe me, now barbaroufly confines himfelf to common Senfe, and fays he never believed a Syllable in Witches; fo that I have not a Companion worth worth a Bodle but honeft JOE MILLER, who would have been created a Peer had he lived in my Reign. Here, JOEwhat asleep, Man? Rouse up, and speak for yourself." Here he wakened a ludicrous Figure who fat by him, and reproved Drowfinefs as unbecoming a Wit; " Troth, JEMMY, replies the Jefter, when there's nothing worth waking for, a Man cannot do better than fleep. I have been fo often tired with laughing at the Difputes of PHILOSOPHERS, Fellows as thickheaded as a Parcel of DUTCH Burgomasters, that I can't be diverted with their formal Nonfenfe any longer; befides, to hear a Couple of Blockheads debate about good Eating and Drinking in fuch a fcurvy Country as this, where there is neither, is. just as ridiculous as for a FRENCHMAN to talk of Liberty; a SPANIARD, of Humility; or a GERMAN, of Temperance. I remember, continues he, when I was on Earth, one of your grave, wife Fellows · F. 2 plagued plagued me over a Pot of Porter fo long, that he obliged me to give him a wicked Wipe; and what do you think I faid, JEM-MY? What, fays his Royal Friend, chuckling with Expectation-why, Faith, I e'en told him that his Babble was like a Scots Fiddle, well enough at first, but damn'd troublesome at last." This unfortunate Simile drew poor MILLER into a Scrape; for JAMES, tho'he had enjoy'd the general Reflections upon other Countries, no fooner heard this Slight upon his own, than, throwing aside his peaceable Disposition, and encouraged by the known Timidity of JOE, he feized his Victim by the Nofe, declared he had intended to honour him with the Dignity of a BARONET; but now, fays he, receive this Reward of your Infolence; fo, applying his Royal Foot to the paffive Posteriors of his late Friend, he expelled him the HALL, and went forth himfelf, muttering the Words Scots Fiddle with great Rage and Confusion.

[67]

[68]

"Bless me, cries a delicate Female, ftarting up, what an unpolifhed Wretch that SOLOMON, as he called himfelf, is ! What Jargon the Creature fpoke! What a Solecifm in good Breeding, to quarrel thus before fo many Ladies of Quality ! And what a hopeful Set of Animals the English must be by this Sample of their King's! But indeed when I was upon Earth, and in that Paradife called PARIS, I have often heard ENGLAND defcribed as the Seat of Barbarifm. Poor imperfect Imitators of our refined Cuftoms and Fashions: Tho' they regularly refort to our Capital, and expend princely Fortunes there in Purfuit of Elegance and true Taste, they return to their infular Confines a diverting Mixture of tawdry Glare, forced Spirits, and affected Eafe."

"Truly, Madam MONTESPAN, replies another Female, tho' you had for fome Time your Grande Monarque at Com-E 3 mand, mand, and from thence may fancy yourfelf a great Woman, I fee no Reafon you have to make fo free with us, and efpecially before me, who was fo well acquainted with your Hiftory.—FRANCE, indeed! did not my Hufband JOHN beat your frippery petit Maitres till you became the Derifion of all EUROPE? Was not he very near expelling the Great Louis from his Paradife of PARIS, as you call it? And did not his Name become a Bugbear even to your Children?"

"As to that, Madam SARAH, fays the Gallic Dame, I am no Politician, therefore won't fay much of the Matter; but, for mere Fighting, poffibly thick Heads and favage Hearts may have an Advantage—But you feem, Madam, to hint at my Hiftory, infinuating, I prefume, your own great Modefty in Contraft; a Point of View, on Examination, not at all advantageous to your Ladyfhip; however,

I have too much Delicacy to enter upon Particulars of fuch a Nature, and fhall only obferve, Madam, that to yield to the Sollicitations of a powerful and amiable Monarch, was lefs a Crime than to rob a Nation, to impofe upon its QUEEN, to defraud Merit, and extort Bribes, thereby fixing the indelible Stain of Avarice upon your JOHN'S Glory; who, to give your Grace my Opinion freely, for all his Military Prowefs, was but a pitiful Fellow to be the Slave of fuch a Wife."

"He had better be the Slave of a Wife than the Slave of a Madam, like your Paramour, Mrs. MINX, retorts SARAH; and if Heaven bleffed me with the better Head of the two, why fhould not he be conducted by me; but I plainly perceive what low Malice is at the Bottom of this, you and all your Weathercock Country hate me, becaufe my Counfels brought you fo low."

" Not

"Not at all, good Madam, replies her Adverfary, we think ourfelves much obliged to you for undoing all that your Hufband had done: From your Conduct may be derived the four happy laft Years of that Reign which had been fo troublefome to us; fo that if you would but lay down the Virago, and take up the Lady; foften your Deportment, give gentler Terms, and talk no more of that Phantom Virtue, (which you certainly had as little real Right to claim as myfelf) we might exift here upon tolerable friendly Terms."

"Friendly Terms with fuch a B——! returns her Antagonift; if I was on Earth again I would give fome Hiftorian Ten Thoufand Pounds to gibbet up your Fame to Pofterity."

Here the Altercation began to rife with fuch Warmth, that in all Probability the Ladies would foon have proved Paffion to

to be inconfiftent with Politeness, or even Decency, had not SWIFT suppressed the Flame of Contention by declaring abruptly, with a loud Voice, That if the Devil had any Residence out of his infernal Regions, it must be in the Tongues of scolding Women. People have been angry, continues he, at my Ressections upon the Sex, tho' every Day proves their Failings to stretch beyond the Power of Satire; no Language but their own envenomed Recriminations being sufficient to give an adequate Idea of them.

"Harkee, Brother JONATHAN, replies RABELAIS, will you never have done fnarling? There can be no Expectation of a Bifhopric here, therefore you have not Difappointment to crofs you; befides, you are full as great a Perfonage now as OXFORD and BOLINGBROKE, who can no longer amufe you with dabbling in the Froth and Scum of Politics, as they did on [74] on Earth: What then can be the Reafon of your retaining that cynical Difpofition which conftituted you the most inhuman Humorift that ever waved a Pen? Your Satire, like a two-edged Sword, cut which ever Side it turned, and your unlimited Ridicule tended to degrade all Humankind: What avails it then to admit your Works to be, in general, a Pattern of Wit, of Humour, of Penetration, of pure and nervous Language, if Juffice obliges us to condemn many of them as deftitute of all Benevolence, and even of common Decency, efpecially wherever you have touched upon the fofter Sex? But indeed you were fufficiently punished for this in the other World, by your Houfekeeper's making a Raree-Show of you, when exhaufted Nature had at laft reduced you to a State of Idiotifm-Prithee, Man, take Example from me and my Neighbour SCARRON here; laugh rather than rail; use Ridicule as a Feather to tickle, not as a Scourge to wound; pity where you reprove; neither write nor fpeak from Paffion nor Intereft, and acknowledge a Truth you always feemed unacquainted with, that good Humour is the only true Humour."

" Fine lukewarm Doctrine this, cries-JUVENAL, as he ftarted up; a delicate Phrase that fame good Humour for tenderhearted, courtly Authors, who are afraid to delineate Vice in her full State of Deformity, lest polite Readers may be fhock'd-Is this fupporting the impartial Dignity of SATIRE? Is this the Method for honeft Rectitude to work a Reformation of Manners? Can the Feather of Ridicule take Effect, where Whips of Steel can hardly make an Impreffion? Who that has a Heart touched with true Zeal, who that is not callous to moral Feelings, can cloath his Face with Smiles amidft fuch Provocation as the corrupted State of Nature ture throws out on every Side? He that would fight the Caufe of Virtue fuccefsfully, must not engage her politic Antagonist in the Ear, but pursue and ftab her to the Heart-Dangerous and irrational is it to trifle with inflammatory Diforders, becaufe efficacious Medicines are painful or unpalatable; nothing but confcious Guilt can ftart at the Voice of SATIRE, however indignant and fevere; therefore no ill Consequence can come of bold Truths and warm Cenfure; in which, and in which only, dwells the true mental Panacea to reftrain pernicious Paffions; to regulate the various Principles of the Mind; and roufe up Reafon to affume and maintain her Empire."

Here HORACE, with graceful Mildnefs, check'd the over-heated Zeal of his Countryman, by remarking, That Reafon was never in greater Danger than in Connexion with an enthuliaftic Imagination.

tion. " All those who have seen your Productions, Friend JUVENAL, continues he, must allow them great Merit; but at the fame Time lament that ungovernable Rage which flames thro' them; SATIRE was undoubtedly your Talent; an extenfive Knowledge of Men and Manners, Dignity of Sentiment, and a most interefting Glow of Expression, place you very high in literary Effimation; but at the fame Time the Eye of Delicacy turns from you overflowed with Tears for the many grofs Ideas which occur in your Productions. There are Vices and Imperfections exifting in our Nature, which cannot be brought within the Limits of agreeable Description or useful Satire. To rake into Filth is more likely to propagate Vice, and to taint, than purify the Mind of the Reader: It gives a large Majority the Knowledge of what otherwife they would not, and indeed fhould not, know. To live in fuch a Time as you did, must undoubtedly doubtedly fill every fenfible Mind with Indignation; but may there not be Enthusiafim in Satire as well as in Religion? There may most certainly: This hurried you away, and your Muse, actuated by the Fervor of a heated Imagination, overleap'd all Bounds. It is but charitable to believe you meant well; that your Fury was neither kindled by Difappointment of your own Expectations, nor proftituted to gratify the malevolent Difpofitions of others; that you wrote from no private or public Prejudice; that you did not oftentatiously defign to infinuate a peculiar Purity of Manners in yourfelf; but really faw, felt, lamented, and therefore rouzed yourfelf to chaftize the national Depravity you have fet forth. Viewed in fuch a Light, you will ftand much exculpated; yet even in this Cafe, every benevolent Friend of Learning must wish you had been possessed of as much Patience to temper your Impetuofity ofity, as you had Spirit to express your Refentment."

PERSIUS, with that grave Solemnity which is the peculiar Characteriftic of his Writings, was preparing to give his Sentiments as a Party concern'd, when he found himfelf interrupted by the late Mrs. MARCARET WOFFINGTON, who declared, with fome Vehemence, that fuch a Monopoly of Conversation among Males, and upon fuch infipid Subjects, was intolerable; while fo many of the other Sex, equally capable and willing to use their Tongues, were obliged to fit filent: "Here, continues she, have I been fome Years in this heathenish Island, and, except fome few occafional Compliments from THE. CIEBER, I have been no more noticed than a caft Mantua; notwithftanding, I have fome fmall Reafon to believe there are not many prefent more indebted to Nature than myfelf."___

felf."—" True, ftap my Vitals, PEG, returns THEOPHILUS; but we are the oddeft Olio of Mortals here that ever were affembled—motley as an Hay-Market Mafquerade, but not half fo polite or entertaining.—Smoke what antediluvian Figures thefe old GREEKS and ROMANS are; they may have been wife Fellows and brave Fellows, but they are quite aukward and unpolifh'd, fplit me."

"Ravifhing Appearances, indeed, fays the Heroine, and their Women too, what Figures! that GiantefsANDROMACHE, what a Tower fhe has upon her Head! enough to fmother a Dozen Ladies of Delicacy; pofitively, there never was feen fuch another Fright."—" Ah, ma Princeffe, interrupts CIBBER, who faw HECTOR frown, and trembled at the Confequence, what would I give that we were now captivating the Million, as we have often done, in Lord FOPPINGTON and Lady BETTY; I the Delight light of the Women, you the Adoration of the Men."---- " No more, no more, cries the afflicted PEG, with a Tragedy-Tofs; what avails the Philosophy which fome of these hideous musty Fellows have made fuch a Buftle about? They neverknew dear Covent-Garden, nor dearer Drury-Lane; they never mingled with pretty Fellows behind the Scenes, nor diftinguished themselves by Repartees in the Green-Room; they knew not the Manœuvres of Intrigue; the magic Twirlings of a Fan; the polite Exercife of that introductory Organ the Snuff-Box; the graceful Difplay of a white Hand and brilliant Ring; the filent Artillery of the Eyes; the melting Languish; the distant Leer; the fpirited Glance; the familiar. Nod; the fignificant Wink; and a thoufand other Appurtenances of genteel Life-But all's over, and here I am, poor Devil, infipid and forlorn as an old Maid or a neglected Prude."

Thefe Words, pronounced with particular Emphasis, and applied with a Sneer to a Female we do not chuse to name, for the Sake of fome living, occafioned a tart Reply to the following Effect :--- "You are always more forward in your Applications to me, Mrs. MARGA-RET, than becomes you; the Liberty of this Place gives you an Opportunity of difplaying your Wit, as you think it, upon the Words old Maid and Prude; but I would have you to know they are either of them preferable to a mercenary Trull, that would facrifice her Favours for Intereft: For my Part, I wonder that fuch Creatures can have the Affurance to fet up their Nofes among Women of Modesty and Virtue."

" Modesty and Virtue, replies MARGA-RET! those Words have a very pretty Sound, truly; I have often repeated them when when I represented romantic, unfashionable Dames of Antiquity; but I could never find out myfelf, nor learn from any other Person, the precise Meaning of them : Many People, I believe, pretend to both, that have neither; and fome who indulge little-fpirited Gallantry, are not fo bad as feveral starch'd-up, formal, fanctified Tapeftry Figures, that confine Modefty to fet Features, and Virtue to Licentioufness that escapes Discovery .---But I hate grave Argument mortally; it is as fure a Prologue to the Spleen, as a dull Sermon, or a Stave of STERNHOLD and HOPKINS; however, I should be glad to hear your precife Ladyship's Notions of these mechanical Accomplishments you feem to admire fo much."

"My Notions, replies the anonymous Difputant, however juft, will undoubtedly appear ridiculoufly mechanical to one fo oppofite in Thought and Action; F 2 how-however, Madam, if you ever read PA-MELA, in her you faw a just Pattern of our Sex."

"Your Smelling-Bottle, dear THE. cries the Theatrical Lady, or I fhall moft certainly faint: PAMELA, ha! ha! ha! ha! Hark ye, HARRY FIELDING; nay, don't hide yourfelf, you old Cuff—you fhall fpeak, and Truth too: You was fuppofed to underftand Characters as well as any Body; what's your Opinion of that fame Mrs. PAM; was there ever yet, or can there be, fuch a one? Come fpeak, nay, I won't let you alone."

"Zoons, take Care of my Gout, PEG, roars the cynical Humorift; I have left Magistracy in the lower World, and yet this curfed Appendage of it still cramps my Hands and Feet." "Well, but you have not the Cramp in your Tongue, replies she, and so you shall speak."

" Shall

" Shall fpeak, fays the Juffice; why, what the Mifchief have I to do with Women's Difputes? As to PAMELA, she is indeed a tolerable Picture, a pretty Moppet of Imagination; but we may fay of her Life, as a learned Bishop did of JONA-THAN'S GULLIVER, that the Story was well enough, but must be a confounded Lye; and that the Book ought to be burnt by a Jury of Females, as LOCKE's Effay on Human Understanding was by the Convocation of OXFORD, for tending to confuse and mislead with impossible Principles-For my own Part, the World and its Actors always appeared to me in fo ludicrous a Light, that I chofe rather to become a Philosopher of the laughing, than of the crying Sect; Cowards boafting of Courage; Lawyers, of Honesty; Divines, of Humility; Statefmen, of Patriotifm; Hypocrites, of Religion; and Whores, of Virtue, is Food for Rifibility not to be withftood : Nor was my Enjoyment felfish; I drew Scenes from Nature, just as Experience prefented them to View, and happily made all my Readers laugh with me. In regard of your Difpute at prefent, I neither know nor care much about it. As to Modesty, she never was among the Number of my Acquaintance; and for Virtue, if you would receive Instruction on this Topic, let me recommend you to JOE ADDISON : But why fhould you debate about the Matter, when you are both of one Way of thinking in the Main? To be worfhipped for an Angel, you, PEG, led the Life of a very Devil; and your pieus Antagonift there, under a Veil of Sanctity, gave, by the Help of an IRISH Footman, two living Inftances of her Virtue."

This unpolite Familiarity touch'd both the Females to the Quick; and Patience not being among the Number of their Qualifications, they united against poor HARRY, [87]

HARRY, who made a most vigorous Defence during a warm Altercation; till happening to wifh his Feet at Liberty, that he might apply them with proper Effect, the enraged Viragos fo unmercifully stamp'd his Chalk-Stone Toes, and fo clawed his magisterial Phiz, that PARSO'N ADAMS, under the. Hands of SLIPSLOP, made not a more rueful Figure. This Fracas put a timely End to the Meeting, for Party began to fhed inflammatory Particles among the Members, and raifed every Voice in Contradiction concerning Right and Wrong.-How far fuch a general Contention might have extended, no one can fay; CATO fided with the Prude, being, as he imagined, a fcandalized Woman of Virtue; ALEXANDER enter'd the Lifts for ROXANA, as a Girl of Spirit; CER-VANTES briftled up to fee his Brother Novellift mauled; and, like his own QUIXOTE, fell on every one that flood in in his Way, while the Friends of Order were enrag'd at fuch Confusion, and especially PETER the GREAT; who declared, That all the Rioters, Male and Female, should be kick'd out, and for ever excluded the TOIRTAZAN. The abrupt Adjournment of this Assembly, as well as the Debates of it, bore near Refemblance to the POLISH Diet; much Talk, little Matter, great Bustle, and no Business.

"Well, Sir HUMPHREY, fays the NAMREDAL, have I not prefented you with a curious Set of Figures, both in Appearance and Difpolition? Matters feldom proceed fo far as they have done at prefent; but there is very little Cordiality at any Time, fo clofe do the darling Opinions and Paffions of Mortals flick to them even here, notwithstanding there is fome Degree of Punishment attending every Individual: And were it not, continues tinues he, that we SUBLUNARS are entirely subject to the NOIBLAN Restrictions and Decorum, there would be as much violent and uncharitable Contention among us in the Moon as upon Earth." From these Remarks, and a more particular Retrospect of the Scene we had been present at, the NAMREDAL drew a Number of moral and focial Inferences, which I would recite at large, only I think them fufficiently obvious; and it is but reasonable that, upon fuch Occasions, every intelligent Reader should think for himfelf; therefore, FELLOW TRAVELLER, leaving you to fuch Speculation as may appear proper, let us both take our Reft till we are difpofed to begin a new CHAPTER.

CHAP. III.

Some Account of the NOIBLAN DRAMA— Remarks on Theatrical Performers—Ad-DISON introduced—The ESTRALAM— An ODE, &c.

A FTER attending the TOIRTAZAN, nothing worthy Remark occurr'd till the NAMREDAL commanded my Attendance to the ESTRALAM, or THEATRE. On our Way thither I took Occasion to inquire, if Theatrical Entertainments in NOIBLA were fimilar to ours.

"No, fays he; in the DRAMA here one general Subject is proposed and uniformly pursued, without the Incumbrance of any Episodical Matter; without Divifion of Acts or Change of Scenes. This Evening Addison entertains us with a new Piece, called SALMINA ELENGALE, the TEMPLE of VIRTUE. All CITIZENS are Actors by Turns, which gives them a just Idea, and a competent Facility of speaking fpeaking in public with Propriety and Grace. To excell in fuch Exhibitions is rather a Credit than a Blemish here; indeed the partial Laws and illiberal Prejudices against Performers in the lower World, have ever appeared to me unaccountable; fince it is certain that, to make any tolerable Figure in fuch a Character, many valuable Qualifications, both intellectual and corporeal, are requifite; Understanding, to conceive; Sensibility, to exprefs; Grace of Perfon and Eafe of Gefture, to engage and to adorn. As to its being taken up from mercenary Views; if all Ranks of People, except those born to independent Fortunes, and even fome of them too, were not actuated by the fame Principle, it might be an Argument of Servility, peculiar and difgraceful; but where Intereft is the univerfal Spring of focial Movement, the very Soul of Action, why should they be fligmatized for obeying the just and powerful erful Voice of honeft Gain? Nay, more, why fhould they be held in Contempt for giving Life and Utterance to those Productions which gain the Authors much Effimation, tho' they write, as the Performers act, for lucrative Purpofes .---- I know, continues he, that the ROMAN Law gave Rife to these Prejudices among the ENGLISH; but with what Propriety? It was made to check the Increase of degenerate and abandoned GRECIANS; who, like the prefent effiminated Sons of ITALY, were pernicious to a free and warlike People. So far Reftriction would be highly commendable; yet, by the Information of HANDEL, who fays he never liked them, but in Compliance with the Caprice of Fashion, Numbers of those ufeless Animals are imported every Year at an immense Charge, and maintained at an incredible Expence. To me it is aftonifhing that those who ought to be the Protectors of national Tafte and Manners, fhould thould cherifh fuch Vermin, who vitiate even that in which they are imagined to excell; rendering Harmony as empty and unmeaning as their own Heads."

Being no Friend to the Signiors and Signoras that infeft the Hay-Market, it is probable I should have made fome additional Remarks not much in their Favour, but that my Guide feemed already in Poffeffion of all I could fuggeft; therefore I contented myfelf with obferving, That it was much to be lamented the Opera Subscription was not converted to the Support of an Academy, under the most eminent ITALIAN Mafters, to inftruct BRITISH Youth in the pleafing and ufeful Arts of Painting and Architecture; from whence the Subscribers, if possesfield of any real Tafte, must enjoy a much more delicate Satisfaction than from hearing beardless Heroes rage in the Forté, melt in the Adagio, caper in the Vivace, reafon reason in Recitative, and expire in femidemi Quavers.

We now reached the ESTRALAM, and the NAMREDAL conducted me to his Box, (which was appropriated to him as Magiftrate, and was the only diftinguished Station in the House) capable of containing eight Persons, and elevated about three Yards above the other Seats, which branch from it on each Side in an amphitheatrical Form, and fill up all the Space to the STAGE; every Person is partitioned from his Neighbour, and so fituated as to be in full View of the NAMREDAL, whose superintending Eye always commands ftrict Decorum.

Inquiring the Reafon of this feemingly unfociable Separation, my obliging Inftructor replied, That upon his Arrival, bating abfolute Riots, the NOIBLAN THEATRE was as liable to Confusion as thofe those in the nether World; but, fays he, I undertook, and have effected, a Reformation. As no two Perfons fit together, there cannot be any Chattering or Noife to interrupt the Performance; Attention does Juffice both to the Sentiment and Utterance; or, at worft, those who cannot relish instructive Entertainment, are prevented from interrupting fuch as can: by this Method alfo each Individual judges for himfelf; ill-timed hafty Criticifms, rifing not from Difcernment but from Paffion, is curb'd; and Opinions are kept in cool Sufpence, till a more proper Time and Place prefents itfelf for comparing them.

I could not but highly applaud this Regulation, nor forbear remarking how it would depopulate our THEATRES; where, like Enthufiafts, the moft go along with the Cry of a few noify Fellows that call themfelves Critics, whofe whole whole Stock of Knowledge confifting in a few mechanical Phrafes of Applause or Censure, influences nine Tenths of the Audience; while they themfelves are influenced by gratis Admittance, Intimacy with fome of the Performers, or to flatter a handfome ACTRESS and their own Vanity, by fupporting her at any Rate; with Infinuations that fhe is a damn'd fine Woman; and that they have particular Reasons for faying fo. If the NOIBLAN Cuftom should be introduced, what would become of those who are wholly employ'd in Remarks upon the Features, Drefs, and Deportment of others, all of whom are facrificed to their own manifest Superiority? What would become of the foft Whifpers and powerful Glances of Intrigue, which fo attractively employ the Belles and Beaus? In fhort, a Playhoufe, fo metamorphofed, must be, to the Sons and Daughters of true Tafte, almost as infipid as a Church; and, of Confequence, the

the Productions of SHAKESPEAR Or OT-WAY will be as little admired as those of CLARKE OF TILLOTSON.

While we were in Conversation, the Audience, leaning over their little Partitions, enjoyed themfelves in the fame Manner, till a Bell, ftriking five Times, gave Notice to begin. Here the NAM-REDAL prefented me a Translation of the. Piece to be exhibited, with this Remark, That the Idioms of the NOIBLAN Language and that of ENGLAND are fo widely different, that I should discover very few of those Beauties which probably adorned the Original; therefore, fays he, you are only to regard the general Tendency and the Sentiments, and not to look for the Stile of ADDISON in the Tranflation: According to the Cuftom that every Author shall introduce his own Piece, he is approaching, and you will now perceive of what Confequence Prac-VOL. II. G tice tice is to Elocution; for he, who could never utter any Thing declamatory in the other World, having, by Cuftom, caft off that childifh Diffidence, or perhaps irrational Pride, which closed his Lips there, is now become one of our most eloquent and most powerful Speakers.

Here the admired Author of CATO prefented himfelf with placid Dignity, and, according to my Tranflation, delivered the following Profe PROLOGUE, for Verfe is employed folely in those Pieces that are fet to Music:

"Your Approbation—Oh NOIBLANS, fo often cordially conferred, muft ever ever warm my Heart with the moft fenfible and delicate Pleafure, Pleafure which nothing can fo foon or effectually communicate as Praife honeftly fought and candidly obtained; it is an undefiled Incenfe that fheds balmy Sweetnefs over the the intellectual Feelings; for fo noble an Acquifition Imagination plumes her Pinions to a profitable Flight, and Judgement labours to a laudable End. Among you the Syren Voice of Flattery cannot charm the Ear, nor the gilded Pageantry of Vice allure the Eye; ye are not Camelion Devourers of mere Sound and Show; the intermeddling Monster, Party, cannot gain Admittance here; nor the Delufive Meteor, Prejudice, lead one Fool aftray-Writers have nothing to influence them but an honeft Ambition of fpotlefs Fame. What is there of Virtue I can offer, which is not known and practifed in this happy ISLAND? Her celeftial Charms are feen by all in their most striking Luftre, and are by all admired; yet, as Exercife is neceffary to invigorate the corporeal, fo is Contemplation to regulate the mental Syftem; and the oftener we view those Beauties, which even the Wicked are forced to honour with their G 2. Respect,

Respect, the more shall we be fired by them to meritorious Pursuits, the more shall we purify and exalt our Natures.

" Upon these Principles I endeavour to remind, not to inform; as in a Mirror I prefent you with the Failings of another World, that you may be the better fatiffied with your own Rectitude, and more fteadily determined to maintain it; for who, that has felt the Power of unblemish'd Innocence, and the Delight of felfapprov'd Virtue, would ever bend an Eye on the falfe Glare of groffer and inferior Enjoyments? My Defign, in its Nature, and in this View, I dare avow; the Execution must be referred to your Judgement, in whofe Approbation I glory, and to whofe Cenfure I fubmit."

Here he retired, and I was going to pay him the Tribute of noify Applaufe, according to the Cuftom of our World, not not only for what he faid, but alfo for the Manner of Delivery, which was peculiarly graceful; when the NAMREDAL ftopp'd me with this Remark, That the Approbation of public Exhibition is always referr'd to the next Day; that Judgement, uninfluenced by the prefent fudden Agitation of the Paffions, may determine with more Impartiality and Precifion.

ADDISON had no fooner concluded his introductory Addrefs, than RICH'S Pantomimical Genius transform'd the STAGE from a plain Hall to the Perspective of a delightful Grove; at the Extremity of which appeared a transparent TEMPLE, feated upon a craggy Rock of awful Appearance and very difficult Access. Within the Vestibule of the Temple fat three graceful Females, representing WISDOM, VIRTUE, and TRUTH; the first of which Characters my Instructor told me was perfonated by ELIZABETH of ENGLAND; the G 3 fecond, fecond, by LUCRETIA of ROME; and the third, by a Virgin of NOIBLA; for there could not be found among all the SUB-LUNARS, one who had not in fome Shape or other offended TRUTH.

Several peculiar and agreeable Symphonies now flruck the Ear, Variety of Inftruments being fo difpofed as to echo one another from all Parts of the Grove, in a moft natural and mafterly Manner: Thefe having continued for ten or twelve Minutes, the following ODE, in fingle Parts and Chorufes, was performed to great Perfection. As a Specimen of NOIELAN Poetry, I give the Original; and, for Sake of Readers who have never travelled to the MOON, nor fludied the Lunar Language, fubjoin the Tranflation.

Thou fpotlefs Regent, Virtue, hail, May Mankind to thy Temple hafte; Hold thou of FAME th' impartial Scale, And give to REASON perfect Tafte.

Let all thy gentle Laws obey, Thy Laws which perfect Blifs beftow; To Mortals fmooth the thorny Way, And teach them all they ought to know.

The Di'mond's dimmer Luftre fades Before thy cheering, fun-like Eye, Which gaily gilds Life's darkeft Shades, Bright Source of mental Liberty.

The

[104]

The ODE being concluded, VIRTUE opened the PLAY, or whatever you pleafe to call it, as will appear in the fucceeding CHAPTER.

CHAP. IV.

The TEMPLE of VIRTUE, and various Characters, exhibited—A Buck, a GENE-RAL, a QUACK, and a Husband-hunting Girl introduced.

"HASTE SISTERS, in whofe kind Affection I find my chief Support, it is not unknown to you what ceafelefs Pains I have taken to gain Profelytes among terreftrial Beings: Humbling myfelf to an almost unparalleled Degree, I have wooed them to the Promotion of their own Happinefs; yet fo much are they influenced, and for the most Part overpowered by those Bosom Foes, their Passions, that I have few real, tho' many hypocritical, hypocritical, Admirers; Hypocrites fo accomplifhed, that while they give me the fevereft Wounds in private, externally they adore me; I have therefore determined to make a public Trial, and to that End have ordered FAME to give a general Summons, promifing each Individual to grant what he may wifh or want, which I imagine will have a more powerful Effect, and draw more Suppliants, than the bare Attraction of my own native Charms, which all praife, yet few endeavour to poffefs."

" The Defign, replies WISDOM, is undoubtedly juft; for while Appearances are preferred to Reality; while Mortals confult Fancy more than Reafon; Appetite more than Prudence; and Paffion more than Judgment, it is needlefs to hope for many Votaries at the Shrine of this TEMPLE, unlefs drawn hither by Delufion."

Here TRUTH interposed, and faid, " She could by no Means agree to Mifreprefentation in any Shape; that unperform'd Promifes were palpable Violations of her Dignity, infufferable Intrufions upon her Prerogative; which is, continues fhe, fo extremely delicate, that the least Infringement not only endangers my Power, but even my very Existence; witnefs the many Regions and the countlefs Multitudes; whence, tho' they owe the most perfect Subjection to my Dominion, I am almost absolutely exil'd: If once I flack the Reins of Government, and let Tongues go unbridled, those who only fport with me at first, will foon become declared Rebels, lofe all Senfe of Duty, and ever after fcorn my Controul. For thefe Reafons, in direct Oppofition to a most injurious Adage, TRUTH should appear like herfelf at all Times, and in all Places, justly difdaining to be the Tool of falfe Complaifance, or mercenary Views." " Dear

[107]

" " Dear Sifter, returned WISDOM, you cannot have a more fincere or more powerful Advocate than I have ever been; and it is with the utmost Regret I fee you fuftain fuch Injuries, as all my Love and Influence cannot prevent; yet let me fay that, in the prefent Cafe, you are free from all Danger. Whatever your eldeft Sifter fuggefts, fhe fanctifies; her Views lead to a defirable End; and if she feems to set you alide, in a general Promife of granting what may be follicited, it is only to eftablish you more firmly; you see her Power and yours declines with equal Pace; an Attempt to recover both cannot deferve Cenfure, fince Delufion, if it may be called fo, working to falutary Purposes, is thereby rendered the Instrument of Good. I know your nice, timid Nature fhrinks back even at the Shadow of Falshood; which, however, cannot be more effectually encountered than by its own Weapons; therefore fear not, W1s-DOM

DOM and VIRTUE will never injure TRUTH, no more than fhe can injure them."

Here FAME appeared, and acquainted the GODDESSES that innumerable Crowds were attending in Confequence of the Summons published; who, if they were admitted promiscuously, would create incredible Confusion, and prevent the regular Progress of Business; VIRTUE therefore ordered that her Gate-Keepers, PERSEVERANCE and INTEGRITY, should admit but one at a Time; then directing FAME to take Place at her Feet, the first Suppliant was introduced.

Upon Perusal of his Figure, I found him to be that very curious Animal an English BUCK or BLOOD. With the ill-bred Affurance and confident Familiarity of fuch a brainless Creature, he addressed himfelf in the following abrupt Manner, tho' tho' the Place and the Appearances loudly demanded the most distant Respect :

"Rot me, Ladies, I am come here upon a very whimmy Occafion; though, by the Bye, I have had a confounded troublefome Tour, fo I hope I fhan't come of a Fool's Errand-But hold-eh-a pretty Hotel enough this-tho' not fo tafty as the Temples, and Pagodas, and Dragons at KEW neither-but no Matter for that, the Thing's well enough, fo I'll proceed to Bufinefs-Yet ftay-upon my Soul my Head is fo much upon the Tantwivy with the Batch of Burgundy I knock'd off among fome Hearts of Oak last Night, that I had almost forgot to ask which of you Ladies is Miftrefs of this Chateau."

"I am, Sir, replies VIRTUE; and thefe are my Sifters, WISDOM and TRUTH." "Humph, fays the BUCK, peeping curioufly thro' an Eye-Glafs—VIRTUE— WISDOM WISDOM—and—TRUTH—then, knock me up, I have been moft egregioully miftaken —I have heard you often mentioned, 'tis true; but, among People of Tafte and Spirit, you are always defcribed as three curfed, ugly, precife old Maids; now, by the Bye, I think if you were a little while among us, you would make fashionable Figures; and if I obtain what I come about, 'tis not Six to Four but I may introduce you to fuch a Set of choice Spirits, that we shall foon be all of a Piece."

"Your Intention, Sir, returns VIRTUE, of making us as wife and as happy as yourfelf, is extremely kind; but, before we confider it farther, pleafe to let me know what unfatisfied Wifh you have brought hither?"

" That you fhall be told immediately, Madam, fays he; I am what the World calls calls a likely young Fellow; brifk, airy, full of Spirit; I can fit up fix Nights without yawning thrice, and knock off fix Bottles each Night; Tom WHIP, the Jockey, Field-Marshal of the Turf, owns I ride as well as himfelf; HEELEM, the Cocker, fwears no Man makes better Bets; HOYLE I have at my Fingers Ends; then, for Wine and Women, ROCHESTER and BUCKINGHAM were but Fools to me."

"Monftrous, cries TRUTH, interrupting him, I can forbear no longer; this Fellow, tho' fufficiently defpicable, wants to reprefent himfelf ten Times worfe than he really is—let him be driven from our Prefence without farther Audience."

" Sifter, replied Wisdom, you are too precipitate, we fhall never gain any Profelytes by fudden and fevere Refolutions; let us hear him out, and then proceed accordingly."

" Well

"Well faid, my little Sparkler, cries the BUCK, Curfe catch me if those roguish blue Peepers of thine, and thy good Nature, have not made me half in Love with thee-Well, to go on with what we are about; all my Acquaintance allow that I am capable of cutting a capital Figure in Life, yet, for all my Qualifications, I am most damnably cramp'd by an old Grub of a Fellow, who calls himfelf my Father; he has fcraped and ftarved himfelf into the Poffession of 2000 l. per Ann. never lived like a Gentleman, and, being determined to prevent me from raifing the Credit of the Family, allows me but pitiful Five Hundred a-year; and what's that to a true Soul? Mere Penury - a paltry humdrum Pittance: Befides, the Cormudgeon talks about my Extravagance, and mumbles fomething of making a Will, that may put it out of my Power to fell or mortgage after his Death : Now, what I with is, is, to have him decently tipp'd off before that happens, the fooner the better; and if you will bring it about, Ladies, why I fhall be extremely your humble Servant, and always make you next Toaft to the Royal Family and the Jockey Club."

"You have ftated your Cafe, rejoins VIRTUE, in a very clear, tho' unfavourable Light; it is, to be fure, great Pity that fo enterprizing a Difposition as yours should fuffer any Limitation; but I know not how to affist you in this Affair, for your Father is a most intimate Acquaintance of mine."

"How! interrupts the Blood, is old Square-Toes a Poacher then? And does he keep Tid-Bits unknown to me?"

"Reftrain your licentious Tongue, fays the Goddefs; his Industry, Prudence, and moralLife, the very Reverse of thy shame-Vol. II. H ful ful Diffipation, have recommended him to my Esteem; what has tainted thy Heart with fuch vile Ingratitude as to wifh that Fountain dried, from whofe Current flowed thy Life? Why wish those Eyes closed that love to look upon thee? And why languish for unnatural Possession of that, which, granted to thy prefent Difpolition, cannot be a Bleffing, must be a Curfe? However, if you will work a thorough Reformation; if you will exchange Extravagance for a prudent Spirit, and affociate with Companions of more deferving Character, I dare promife that your Father will equally fhare every Advantage with you while alive, and leave you in full Possession of his Fortune when he dies."

"Hey Day, hey Day, cries the Suppliant; you preach juft fuch infipid Stuff as fome of our Parlons; I'll tell you what, my grave Madam, if I can't fpend my For-Fortune according to my own Difpofition, I muft be e'en content to wait, and raife Money at Fifty per Cent. till Dad knocks up in the natural Way.—Œconomy and Prudence! ha! ha! ha! I fhould make a very fine Figure indeed with your Advice—fo Miftrefs VIRTUE, Lady WIS-DOM, and Mifs TRUTH, fince you have nothing better to offer, I may as well fhove off without farther Compliment."

"Hold, Friend, cries JUSTICE; with Permiffion of the Goddels of this TEM-PLE I grant thy Wifh; this Moment thy aged Sire lays him down in the Sleep of Death, and thou art now unlimited Mafter of his Poffeffions; but be affured, ere long, thou wilt have Caufe to wifh him alive again, when the Torrent of thy Vices has borne thee down, and left thee naked on the inhofpitable Shore of Poverty."

"No Matter for that, fays the overjoyed Heir—a fhort Life and a merry one—now I can have a Match over the Beacon Course, or back the Main for Five Hundred, with any Lord of them all."

This fprightly Child of modern Merit was fucceeded by one whofe Appearance had in it a Kind of venerable Terror; a dignified Ferocity. Having made Obeifance to the Throne, he delivered himfelf as follows:

"Moft amiable GODDESS of this TEM-PLE, unufed as I am to the fmooth Polifh of courtly Language, and fubtle Windings of Infinuation, receive an Addrefs, blunt, yet honeft in its Nature, founded on Sincerity, without Art.

"Know then I am, and have been fince my earlieft Years, a Son of War; many many perilous Encounters, many Hardfhips laborioufly toiled thro', and mostly fuccefsful in their Event, have raifed me, by Steps of just Gradation, to the Degree of a General; in which Situation I have extended my Country's Strength and Glory to incredible Limits, and that with the univerfal Approbation of those I have had the Honour to command. Nor have I acted upon interested Motives; a genuine Thirft of FAME first fired me to great Exploits, and has ever been the ruling Principle of all my Actions; had it not, I might have laid me down in the filken Arms of Peace, and reclined upon the Down of Luxury, there to indulge the more ungenerous Paffions in a Life of fhameful Indolence ; but, difdaining aught fo foreign to Public Good, and inconfistent with the Dignity of my Nature, I preferred Temperance to Luxury, Labour to Eafe, and Perils to Safety.

" Let

"Let not this Account be deemed oftentatious Vaunting of my own Merit, fince it is literally juft; and the prefent Occafion requires I fhould offer fome Facts to fupport the Claim I lay to a fair, exalted, and lafting Place in the Records of FAME, that my Name may be engraved on ever-during Brafs, and not vanifh with the transfient Breath of popular Applaufe; this granted, I fhall have attained my ultimate Wifh, and think myfelf thoroughly rewarded for all my Toils."

VIRTUE now took Occasion to observe, "That tho', in her own Nature, she far preferred the Smiles of Peace to the Frowns of War, yet Military Merit was highly deferving in her View; for, continues she, what Character is more complicate, more difficult to perfect, than that of a complete GENERAL? who must have Resolution, to face the most imminent Hazards; Hazards; Humanity, to treat Enemies with Tendernefs; Penetration, to forefee profperous Events; and Caution, to anticipate unfavourable ones: Activity, to cultivate Success; Perfeverance, to furmount Difficulties; Sagacity, to project; Experience, to conduct; and Steadinefs, to execute his Schemes: Patience, to temper Impetuofity; Vigilance, to feize Occafion; Liberality, to engage Regard; Dignity, to fupport Command; Difcipline, to promote Order; and Condefcenfion, to render Subordination as agreeable to all Ranks as the Nature of the Service will admit: This extensive Portrait confidered, in which View you place yourfelf before us, most certainly merits the Diftinction you apply for : What fay you, SISTERS, shall we order FAME to gratify his Wish?" WISDOM nodded Afent; but TRUTH objected as follows:

"SISTERS, no one can more admire, or would fooner join in the juft Reward of Merit, than myfelf; and it is with fenfible Regret that I find myfelf at prefent under the Neceffity of offering any Thing againft extensive Defervings; but my Name, my Nature, and my Station in this TEMPLE, all oblige me.

"What this Veteran has advanced in his own Favour generally, I cannot deny; but, as you have already remarked, there are many more Requifites effential to a perfect Child of FAME, than those he has fet forth; that he has atchieved feveral great and arduous Exploits, in the fupposed Service of his Country, I shall not contradict; but the Glare of Vittory is often the Tinfel Covering of very melancholy Effects to that State it shines on: That he has preferred a Life of Toil to one of Indolence, I readily admit; but what what were his Motives? Patriotifm?-No-a true Patriot will lament the Neceffity of War; he always fecretly rejoiced in it, and did his utmost to promote it. Was he void of Intereft in his Views ?---No-witnefs the Devastation fpread thro' conquered Countries, by levying enormous Contributions; great Part of which, inftead of fupporting or encouraging the Soldiery, found their Way into his own infatiable Coffers. Has he given Life to Merit ?- No-those who paid, not those who fought best, he promoted. Did he always avail himfelf of Advantages for the Intereft of his Country ?--- No---more than once he has taken Bribes of the Enemy, to forego fuch Opportunities as might have been decifive.

"Thefe Things confidered, which he cannot have Hardinefs enough to deny before me; or, if he fhould, would not therefore be the lefs true, tho' they do not not entirely exclude him from the Lifts of Fame, yet do they fufficiently fpeak against the exalted Station he aspires at; therefore, SISTERS, with your Concurrence, I shall order him to be set down a very GREAT GENERAL, but a very BAD MAN."

VIRTUE and WISDOM entirely agreeing to this Decifion, FAME entered him accordingly; which feemed to chagrin the Son of MARS highly, who went off muttering with great Indignation, "That little better could be expected, when Females fat as Judges of heroic Actions."

The next who claimed Audience, was an important Figure with emaciated Features, large Penthouse Brows, a huge dark Tye, a Suit of SPANISH BROWN adorned with a Multiplicity of Buttons, a Goldheaded Cane to support his meditative Chin, and a peaceable Sword which had never [123] never quitted its Scabbard: Having paid his Addrefs with truly claffical Formality, this illegitimate Son of HIPPOCRATES, for fuch he appeared to be, fpoke to the following Effect:

"Unacquainted with the Titles and Decorum used in this TEMPLE, it is not to be wondered at if I should inadvertently run into Solecisms; but a general Profession of Respect will prove, I hope, illustrious Ladies, a general Exculpation.

"I ftand before you an injured Profefor of PHYSIC; one who has more enriched the Materia Medica than all the Faculty befides; yet that Seat of Ignorance in Warwick-Lane *, jealous of my fuperior Talents, has ftigmatized me with the Title of a QUACK, and put my ineftimable Difcoveries upon a Footing with the Sack Drop, the Sweating Powder, and Fiftula Paste of WARD—the Valerian, the

* College of Phyficians.

Bardana,

[124]

Bardana, and Sage of HILL-nay, with the Viper Drops of Rock, and fuch-like illiterate Pedlars in MEDICINE; but fcorning the common Dog-trot Pace of Phy-SIC, I have feverally fludied ENGLISH, SCOTS, IRISH, and WELSH Conftitutions; for each of which I may venture to affirm I have difcovered the true Panacea. For the first, I have my infallible Effence Porteria-for the second, Marmalade de Oatmeleana-for the third, Ballamum Potaticum-and for the fourth, Spiritus Leekicus: Now thefe, Ladies, are of my particular, original Invention; yet, tho' I have obtained Patents to recommend them; have advertifed till I can bear the Expence no longer; have wrote, as is ufual in fuch Cafes, Letters of Thanks to myfelf; and have procured Affidavits of extraordinary Cures from more than ever took them; yet all won't do, and for no other Reafon than that I have no Chariot; for you must know, illustrious Fair Ones, that that much Merit lies in an Equipage, and there is very little Chance, in our Way, without it; therefore if, out of Regard to Mankind, you will affift me with a Carriage and Pair, or, to fecure all, a Carriage and Six, I make no Doubt of obfcuring not only my Contemporaries, but even all my Predeceffors in the Phyfical Way."

Here WISDOM, who had been fome Time whifpering with FAME, replied, "Friend, the Profeffion of which you pretend to be, is an Object of my particular Regard; and forry I am to find it fo often difgraced, and rendered obnoxious, by ignorant Pretenders; who, with blufhlefs Faces and unfeeling Hearts, augment the Miferies of Fellow-Creatures, to promote their own mercenary Views: Such a one, FAME fays, you are entered in her Note-Book, a Firft-rate Man-

Man-killer; and therefore, inftead of gratifying your Wifh, we fhall give you into the Keeping of Honefty, that you may do no more Mifchief; in the mean Time confefs yourfelf an Impoftor, or worfe will follow."

Here the trembling Empiric endeavoured to apologize, by obferving, That every one had a Right to try for Bread : " My Father, I must own, fays he, was a Taylor, and indeed would have brought me up in his own Trade, but my Genius foared higher; fo I ran away, and got to be Sweeper of an Apothecary's Shop (many great Men have rifen from fmall Originals); from thence I attended an itinerant Phyfician for feveral Years, and, feeing fome thrive that knew as little as myself, I e'en set up; but, LADIES, if it is not an honeft Profession, I have another at Hand, which I can eafily affume; Ţ

I can give up HIPPOCRATES for WHITE-FIELD; Phyfical Prescription for Methodist Preaching, and perhaps be no Lofer."

"Audacious Wretch, cries TRUTH, dareft thou profess thyfelf my Enemy in the tendereft Point of my Interests and Affections, in Religion? Art thou equally ready to prey on the immortal as the mortal Part? There are too many Vermin of thy Kind wandering about already, to the Subversion of focial Order and moral Good; therefore it is but just to prevent thee from adding to the Number, fo we doom thee to perpetual Imprifonment; and I could wish that every Moral and Physical QUACK breathing were equally in our Power."

The difappointed Adventurer was now removed, with much Horror of Countenance, to his Captivity; execrating Ambition, that had made him look on his Father's

Father's Goofe, Needles, and Sheers in fo contemptible a Light; and regretting the egregious Folly of a Rogue's feeking Preferment in the TEMPLE of VIRTUE; tho', added he, I have heard FORTUNE is blind, and I hoped these Folks were fo too.

Next, a blooming Girl, of remarkable Vivacity, prefented herfelf, and was going to addrefs the Throne without any Symptoms of Diffidence, when VIRTUE anticipated her thus:

"Young Lady, I am glad to fee one of your Age and Appearance come to this TEMPLE; I fhall have a particular Pleafure in fhowing myfelf your Friend, and you cannot any where find fafer or more gentle Protection; but give me Leave to remark and condemn an unbecoming Confidence you feem to be poffeffed of; my Votaries may be free, but I do not chufe them to be forward."

« Lack-

"Lack-a-day, Madam, replies the Suppliant, I don't know what you call forward, but all young Ladies of Fashion are easy and familiar; and Mamma has often told me that such a fine Girl as me, should never be bashful in any Company."

"There it is, fays WISDOM, fine Girls are fpoiled by foolifh Mothers, who are continually trumpeting Beauty in their Ears, without taking any Care of their Principles and Difpofitions; Affectation is taught for Addrefs; Impudence, for Spirit; and Intrigue, for Understanding. I fuppofe now, Child, continues fhe, this kind Mamma takes Care that your Beauty fhall be ornamented with all the Changes of Fashion."

" Oh yes, Madam, replies the Favourite, I am always in the very Tip of the Mode, and feldom mifs any public Place except Church; nay, we fometimes go Vol. II. I there there too, when we hear of a new-married Couple making their Appearance, to fee what the Bride is dreffed in, and how she looks. Now I talk of that, there was Mifs Gauky, a horrid ugly Neighbour of ours, made fuch a Figure-ha! ha! ha! ha! last Sunday; no Taste, no Life, but looked as mumchance as if fhe had been a Citizen's Wife thefe feven Years-and her Bridegroom, fuch a Hottentot! with his formal cut Bob, ftiff-topp'd white Gloves, and fuch a Quaker-like Suit, that the whole Gallery were in a conftant Roar.—Well, certainly, to People of Fashion, such Creatures are high Entertainment."

"Very brilliant Notions you feem to have of Life, Mifs, fays VIRTUE, pray what Age may you be?"

"Sixteen, Madam, returns this Daughter of Spirit, tho' I believe they cheat me out out of a Year or two; indeed Mamma fays I am fit for a Husband, and, to tell you the Truth, I have thought fo myfelf thefe three Years; but the cll Glumps my Father calls me a light-headed Huffy, as if be could know any Thing of Women's Matters; Mamma often calls him a Fool, and bids him mind his own Affairs; but he will be meddling, and fo, forfooth, I want to get out of his Way. Now, there's a charming, delicate, fweet, fine Gentleman, that fwears he loves me better than ANTHONY did CLEOPATRA: that he would, like him, lofe the World for Love, and a thousand other ravishing Things: He is an Officer too, and wears Scarlet trimm'd with Gold; and has the finest Hair, speaks French, and dances like an Angel; fo I come here to beg that I may have this delicate Creature for a Husband, and that old Gruff may give him all my Fortune."

I 2

There

[132]

"There cannot be, fays VIRTUE, a truer Friend to the Married State than myfelf; 'tis there I find my moft pleafing Refidence, and my most permanent Joy; but as to many it is a Climate of undifturbed Serenity and true Repofe; fo to others, who unadvisedly and at improper Seafons journey thither, it proves an uncomfortable Seat of Perturbation and continual Storms; barren of every Comfort, and pregnant with every Ill. More appertains to a prudent Choice than is usually thought of; Politeness and a liberal Education are agreeable Qualifications in a Wife; but domestic Œconomy, which you are too young to know, and Complacence, which good Senfe alone can give, are indifpenfible Requifites to make the Married State happy: But even fuppose you are possessed of these, if the Object of your Regard happens to be worthlefs, and you have no Affurance to the contrary, the Prospect must be gloomy; my; let your Father's Caution direct your Choice, and check that inconfiderate, youthful Impatience, which probably may urge you into a State of long and bitter Repentance."

"What, repent having fuch a charming Man as the Captain, fays Mifs Hotupon't! impoffible; befides, I know he is to be my Hufband; a very great FOR-TUNE-TELLER faw him in three Coffee-Cups running, and told me his Size, and the Colour of his Hair, as exactly as if he had been in the Room; fo you know I muft have him, it is my Fate: But then I want to have him foon, and I want to have my Fortune too, that he may keep me a grand Equipage, and all the other Appurtenances of a fine Lady."

"Well, fays VIRTUE, to prevent the ill Confequences which probably may at-I 3 tend tend the Oppofition of your Inclinations, I grant your Wifh; but remember hereafter that your own precipitate Disposition is the sole Cause of whatever Inconveniences may ensue."

"Yes, yes, I'll remember, replies the overjoy'd Suppliant; but a Fig for Danger, would not any Girl of true Spirit pleafe her Eyes, tho' fhe fhould plague her Heart?—Well, Ladies, I vow I am very much obliged to you, and if you will honour me with your Prefence when I am fettled, at my firft Route, which I intend to make fo grand that all the World will be there, I'll do every Thing in my Power to return the Obligation."

"A ROUTE, Madam! replies WIS-DOM, if you had been tolerably acquainted with us, you would have known that we are never feen at ROUTES."

" Not

"Not feen at a ROUTE! cries Mifs, pofitively that's ftrange, and plainly fhows you are not much among People of Quality; now, I doat on Perfons of Rank, and when I am married I fhall be one myfelf; fo, dear Ladies, your moft obedient humble Servant."

" A pretty Sample this, fays WISDOM, of a ruined Favourite; who, by the Folly of a Mother, has been nurfed up in Diffipation and Vanity, to the utter Deftruction of a good natural Genius, and an amiable Difpofition; but miftaken Indulgence fo generally prevails, and Parents labour fo much to create artificial Paffions, that this Object, tho' pitiable, is not at all fingular."

But I fee the CHAPTER is of a fufficient Length, and a Paufe may be as acceptable to the Reader as it is to the Author.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

The TEMPLE of VIRTUE continued—A DWARF—A YOUNG WIFE—An Au-THOR, and other Characters introduced.

HE next Suppliant was a Man of very diminutive Size, on whom Deformity had exerted her utmoft Power, prefenting himfelf respectfully. He remarked, " That he had been unfortunate from his Cradle, despifed even by his Parents, for no Caufe but unavoidable Defects in Perfon : Indeed, continues he, I have derived fome Advantage from my Misfortune, as it has imprinted upon me, and caufed me to purfue, an excellent Maxim of SOCRATES, who advifes daily Contemplation in a Glafs, that the Beautiful may make their Minds worthy of their Perfons, and that the Deformed may render their Dispositions an Apology for their Defects: Upon this Plan the whole Tenor of my Conduct has been rather to confult confult the Pleafure and Advantage of my Fellow-Creatures, than felfifily to reap either from their Harm: I have uniformly indulged a rational Sympathy, to weep with the Sorrowful; to laugh with the Gay; and to be ferious with the Grave : Folly, however opulent or titled, has never been the Idol of my Adoration, nor natural Failings the Object of my Cenfure; yet, with a Difpolition to embrace all Mankind, that would, if poffible, diffuse universal Happiness, Mankind make me the cruel Return to fet me up as an Object of Ridicule, for no other Reafon but becaufe I am not bleffed with the natural Symmetry of Parts; my humble Petition therefore is, That hereafter I may not be treated with fuch illiberal Cruelty, nor so often reminded of my unavoidable Misfortune."

"Hard indeed, fays VIRTUE, is thy Lot, my Son; yet while all have Eyes, and

and but few Judgment, intrinsic Worth will be fubject to the Sneers of Ignorance, where it happens not to be deck'd out in the adventitious and transitory Ornaments of Riches or Beauty: Had ALEXANDER been in no greater Sphere than thou art, those who deified his Power would have made themfelves merry with his wry Neck; let this lovely Reflection comfort thee, That tho' Nature has denied thee Harmony of Shape, my Sifter WISDOM here has bleffed thee with Delicacy of Thought, and Integrity of Soul. The Infects of Ridicule will buzz, will ftrike their unavailing Stings; but do thou keep thy Course, nor ever cast an Eye upon Objects fo much inferior to thee, unlefs to pity the much more material Deformity of their Minds. It is not in the Power of VIRTUE, WISDOM, and TRUTH, to prevent the Sarcaíms of Malevolence; but we can and will enable thee to bear them without Emotion; depart part then, affured of our Favour, which fhall fmooth the rugged Paths of Life; which fhall raife thee above the partial Power of FORTUNE; and, after Death fhall have diffolved thy perifhable and uncomfortable Frame, fhall embalm thy Memory as a beauteous Pattern for Imitation; while those who indulge their Spleen at thy Expence, fhall moulder forgotten into Duft, no better, no more lovely, than thine."

Here the Suppliant departed with that delicate and perfect Satisfaction, which VIRTUE alone can give to a Heart poffeffed of proper Feelings.

Another Female approached next, and delivered herself thus:

" Ladies, I come to beg your Affiftance in an Affair of great Confequence; you must know I have been married just fix fix Months; Mr. STRUGGLE, my Hufband, was the tendereft Lover that ever Woman had; and indeed, for the firft three Months, I thought him the beft Hufband in the World; but I have now been told otherwife by my Neighbours, Mrs. CHATWELL and Mrs. TELLTALE."

"How, Madam! fays VIRTUE, have your Neighbours a better Opportunity of knowing your Husband than yourself?"

"Yes, certainly, replies the difcontented Wife, for they have been married feveral Years, and know the World better than me; befides, now they have put me upon it, I can fee how other People behave; there's Mr. CHATWELL, like a good Soul as he is, gets up in a Morning, dreffes the Children, makes Breakfaft ready, and carries it to Bed to his Wife, who very feldom gets up before Eleven o'Clock, becaufe fhe is almost always breeding, breeding, poor Woman: Now, though I have declared myfelf pregnant, my rude Bear has never once offered to do fo for me, but bids me ftir nimbly, and fays that Exercife is good for my Condition— There's a cruel Wretch."

" Truly, fays Wisdom, if this is your chief Complaint you have more Reafon to commend your Husband, and value him as a Man of Sense, than to be uneafy."

"Man of Senfe! cries Mrs. STRUGGLE, I don't fee why he fhould have more Senfe than his Neighbours; nor why I fhould not be as well ufed as any other Wife—there's Mr. TELLTALE does not want Senfe, yet he dares not fay Muff if his Wife begins. The good-natur'd Creature won't help himfelf at Table becaufe fhe fays he's aukward; and never keeps a Penny of Money in his Pocket but what fhe gives him; nay, he won't even even put on his Sunday Cloaths till he has afk'd her Leave, and fhe may fcold the Servants for three Hours together without a Check from him; want what fhe will, go where fhe will, do what fhe will, all's right: Tho', between ourfelves, fhe was but his Houfe-Keeper, and, they fay, no better than she should have been before Marriage; but she's in the Right of it, give the Men an Inch and they'll take an Ell; my Tyrant's a Proof of that; indeed he gives me Liberty to get any Thing I want, in Reafon, as he calls it, nor can I fay he is ever out of Temper; but while other Wives have more Power than me, I am determined never to be eafy; fo what I wish is, that if a Man of Sense won't be obedient to his Wife, Mr. STRUGGLE may be made a Fool as fast as possible."

" That, Madam, is not in our Power, fays Wisdom; befides, if it were, we could not do you a greater Injury than by com-complying with your Wish: The whole of your Uneafiness, and I believe it is the Cafe of too many, appears to arife from the contemptible Infinuations of Buly Bodies, whom you feem to confider as Weil-wifhers; but what Example of Credit can be derived from fuch as neither confult Reafon nor Decency? Be affured that every Woman, who invades the Prerogative of her Husband, works her own Shame as well as his. There are Lines of Rectitude in the Marriage State to mark out and limit the just Sphere of Action; on either Side to pass these, is to run into Error. Power, as well as all other Poffeffions, ought to be held in an exact Medium; if it be made to preponderate on the Male Side, it is ungenerous; on the Female, prefuming; therefore confider yourfelf as happy, that you are not like those Neighbours you feem to envy; depend upon it they do not advife you from Principles of true Regard, but from from a Defire of exciting Quarrels; be advifed, and keep the Affection of a good and fenfible Man while you have it; remember it is a tender Plant, and cannot outlive the frofty Breath of Contention; cherifh it while you have it in full Bloom, nor ever expect to find a Guardian and Protector in one who can wear the Name without the Dignity of a Hufband."

"Well but, fays Mrs. STRUGGLE, if I don't bold my own, as the Saying is, I fhall be called fo many poor tame Creatures, that I fhan't be able to put my Head abroad."

" Fear not, returns WISDOM, you are just beginning Life, and 'tis rather unfortunate that you have fallen into the Society of fuch termagant Goffips; but, fince you are come to follicit our Affistance, I'll take Care to conduct you in a fafe and pleafant Path; not in a State of Sub-Subjection, but fympathetic Complacence, which makes the Hymæneal Torch burn bright, and beams perfect Happinefs around those Hearts wherein it is cherisched."

Notwithstanding that the Love of defpotic Sway (fo incident to Female Minds, and which had been fo much enflamed in this young Wife, by the Arts of old Practitioners in domestic Usfurpation) feemed to hold a ftrong Conflict with natural Mildnefs; yet the weighty Remonstrance of WISDOM had fuch an Effect as to fend this Suppliant away, apparently well fatisfied.

The next in Succeffion was a fhabby, pitiful Appearance, yet rendered laughable by a grotefque Air of affumed Confequence, very ill adapted to his Figure; which, if RIDICULE is at any Time confiftent with Reafon and Humanity, is cer-Vol. II. K tainly tainly the faireft Mark that can be fet up for it.

This Son of Poverty, addreffing himfelf, faid-" Most divine Ladies, more abundant in Beauty than the Sun's Rifing, Setting, or Meridian Rays, I think I may pronounce myfelf a Man of good Defervings, both as to my Abilities and Inclinations; yet, fo it is, that I am often pennylefs, while Knaves and Blockheads of all Sides roll in Plenty. Without Oftentation I may claim Equality, if not Precedence of all my Contemporaries, in the Literary Way; yet, notwithstanding the just Title I have to National Regard, thro' the Partiality, Ignorance, or Caprice of the World, I have much ado to fubfift, and all for want of what is called a Name; without which the brighteft Talents are neglected, and the greatest Merit is unprofitable: I come therefore to petition, that, thro' your Favour, FAME may eftablifh eftablish my Character, and at least set me upon a Footing with some who deferve less, yet enjoy more."

WISDOM obferved, in Return, "That fhe and her SISTERS ever lamented the Difficulties of Genius; that fhe knew Merit was not always the Parent of Succefs; but, fays fhe, that we may the better judge of your Cafe, let us have fome Account how your Talents have been employed: It is an invariable Maxim with us never to effeem any AUTHOR good, who is not alfo incorruptibly boneft."

" If that be the Cafe, fays the Petitioner, how very few can appear in the Lift of your Approbation? Yet fuffer me to hope I may be one; but let the Sketch of fome Part of my Life, which I fhall fubmit to Confideration, fpeak my Claim more at large.

« My

[148]

" My Father, who had been the indigent, laborious Curate of an over-grown Living many Years, wanted Means to place me at the UNIVERSITY; however, by his own tender Attention, the Lofs was nearly made up to me: He made me a good Claffical Scholar, laid a folid Foundation of Moral Philosophy; gave me a pure and unprejudiced View of Religion; and fince, to indulge the political Genius of his Parish, he read the News Paper as conftantly as the BIBLE, I had an Opportunity of knowing how Matters went in most Parts of the World; a Branch of Study which, purfued with Moderation, he faid was highly useful-He died in my twenty-fifth Year, and left me nothing but my Head to depend upon.

" Launched into Life, Chance first threw me in the Way of a Noble Lord, who condefcended to retain me as his SECRETARY; and indeed he very much wanted wanted one, being himfelf extremely deficient both in the Matter and Manner of Writing; yet his Propenfity to bufy himfelf in State Affairs, and to make a Buftle in the World, was as great as if his Abilities had been equal to the higheft Station.

" In the Service of this Noble Lord I wrote feveral Political Speeches and Pamphlets, by Means of which, as appeared afterwards, he obtained a confiderable Employment; but finding when he was IN Place, that he wanted me to contradict and falfify all I had advanced when he was out, I took the Liberty to remonftrate against fuch mean Temporizing; which fo irritated his high Blood, that he difmiffed me with no other Reward than the bare Maintenance I had received, and fome unmeaning Promifes of Friendship occafionally thrown out while in his Family."

"I have often heard of that Wretch, fays WISDOM, who, like many other empty, infolent Pretenders, has the matchlefs Affurance to boaft an Intimacy with me; but I have marked him, and fome more of FORTUNE's fcandalous Favourites, for public Detection; which fhall leave them no Retreat, but the pitiful Afylum of hereditary Titles."

"Accident, continues our AUTHOR, next threw me in the Way of an opulent COUNTRY SQUIRE, whofe Friendship I fo much engaged by writing a Song on the Chace, that, in the Zeal of his Heart, he fwore I was, except himfelf, the cleverest Fellow living, and therefore employed me as Tutor for his two Sons: In this Situation I had almost become a Martyr to his Kindness; for Bottles and Punch-Bowls were as feldom off the Table as if the House had been one of public Entertainment.

" My

" My Pupils I found to be naturally dull, but render'd more fo by the extraordinary Pains the SQUIRE had taken to make them no wifer than himfelf. In Conversation he used to boast that the eldeft should leap a five-barr'd Gate with any Man, or Woman either, for a hundred Guineas; as to the younger, he mark'd him out for a Parfon, having a good Living in his own Gift; for which Reafon, added he, the Lad must have fome Linguo, and be a Bit of a Scholar; tho' you need not load his Head too much neither, for you know he can get fome poor, wife Fellow of a Curate cheap enough; and if he has a Mind to preach himfelf, why they tell me he can buy very good SER-MONS for Eighteen Pence or Two Shillings a Dozen.

"By liftening patiently to fuch Kind of Entertainment, and giving him his own Way, he grew fo exceffively fond of me, that that he talked of getting me Bifhop'd his Phrafe for Ordination, and generoufly faid I fhould have Thirty Pounds a-year, befides Bed and Board in the Family, till his Son came of Age; upon Condition, however, that I would not plague them with long SERMONS; but make my Difcourfes merry and fhort, with now and then a Bam upon the COURT; for fo far, as hating the Administration, be was a PATRIOT too.

"Prefuming to remark the Impropriety, nay, the Scandal, of a Preacher's fubmitting to any Direction but that of RE-LIGION and his own Judgment, my polite Patron called me a Fool and a Blockhead; which occafioned a Coolnefs that at length grew into a downright Quarrel, and ended in our Separation; for, getting a fevere Fall a-hunting one Day, and declaring that I would never venture my Neck again upon fo filly an Occafion, Occafion, the SQUIRE openly declared he would no longer keep fuch a Chickenhearted Son of a B—— in his Family."

" By the Defcription you give, fays VIRTUE, this SQUIRE must be that ignorant, infolent Fool of Fortune, who, with brutal Heart, has fo often affaulted me in the Perfons of innocent Country Girls: Well was it to escape from such a Monfter, whose shameful Practices must either give continual Pain to an honeft Mind, or, by the dangerous Force of Example, bring his Affociates into his own contemptible and abandoned State. Thus far, my Son, thou hast highly merited our Favour; proceed, and if thou haft uniformly purfued the fame Track, thou mayft be affured of our Affiftance."

" After those already mentioned, refumes the Suppliant, I met with a large Variety of Characters, too tedious to enumerate; merate; let it then fuffice to fay, that from feveral I might have pick'd up a comfortable Livelihood, could my Nature have proftituted itfelf to their Follies and Vices; but having always confidered a venal Pen as the most dangerous Weapon in Nature, I could not be prevailed upon to fatirize boneft Men, nor deify Brutes. From this invariable Adherence to what I think right, a worthy BOOKSELLER, who has usher'd fome of my best Pieces, unfuccessfully, into the World, fays I derive my Poverty, and that I must take fome popular Step to procure a Name before I can hope for even a tolerable Subfiftence. This is the Motive of my Sollicitation, and I fubmit the Cafe, with all Deference, to your Candor."

TRUTH having confirm'd every Article of his Relation, VIRTUE again applauded his Integrity, and at the fame Time commiferated

miferated his Situation in most pathetic Terms. "Whatever may be the Event of thy Endeavours, continues she, for it is very doubtful whether we can command Succefs in thy Favour, I will promife to fill thy Mind with a confcious Satisfaction, a true Harmony, which the undeferving Favourites of FORTUNE may languish for in vain. I am very intimate with CONTENT, who will, upon my Interceffion, fuit thy Wifhes to thy Poffeffions: If to this FAME, who shall exert herself in thy Favour, can add agreeable Circumftances, we shall all rejoice. Go then, adhere to thy Integrity, however unprofitable; be affured it will afford thee the most lasting Satisfaction, the most uninterrupted Serenity of Mind, and give thee Happiness, which I only have the Power to beftow."

The honeft Author was retiring with much Pleafure in his Countenance, when Wisdom

WISDOM delivered herfelf to this Effect:

"Hold, Friend, fome Words with you before you depart, and don't think that what I am about to offer is meant to pain, but to ferve you; that you have Genius, I know; that your Succefs is far beneath your Merit, I lament; and that your Integrity has been inviolate, I allow. I am your Friend, and fure Friendfhip is never fhown to more Advantage than in kind Reproofs; hear me then while I point out to you thofe Circumftances in which I think you erroneous.

"Doft thou not know that all Pride, and particularly Self-fufficiency, is utterly irreconcileable to my Dictates? That, by ftriving to magnify thy real Abilities, in Effect they are diminiscent of a figure to a Superiority over thy Contemporaries, is commendable; to determine, to boast of, or or even to hint at fuch a Superiority thyfelf, is weak. Another Error I think thee liable to, is an obftinate Adherence to thy own Opinion, which thou takeft to be Integrity; this has occafioned thee to contradict and run counter to the Generality of Mankind, who may be led by Perfuafion, but not driven by Brow-beating: He who would inftruct the World and live by it, must feldom appeal to Severity, but in every honeft Way muft humour human Nature; till, like heated Wax, it becomes fit to receive a due Impreffion. For want of preferving the Golden Mean between fervile Compliance and dogmatical Oppofition, thy Succefs has not been equal to what it might have been; wherefore, that the friendly Endeavours of FAME may be more effectual, let me recommend it to thee rather to refemble the pliant Willow, than the ftubborn Oak. Chufe to wind about rather than knock down; that is, change Self-Self-fufficience for Humility, and Contradiction for Perfuafion; comply with fome of the Whims, that you may the more powerfully combat the Vices of the Age; correct with Smiles; then even the real Objects of SATIRE will fuffer with Patience, and all Mankind will become thy Friends."

[158]

This mild Rebuke, temper'd with fuch falutary and friendly Hints, feemed to have a very fenfible Effect upon our Au-THOR; who, promifing ftrictly to obferve the Admonitions, immediately retired."

Here the TEMPLE was fuddenly difturbed with a confused Noise of—I will come in—But you shan't come in—Consider my Rank and Quality—Carry it to COURT, it won't do here—and fuch-like Altercation; at length a very portly Figure, with a most ponderous Wig, rushed forwards, HONESTY holding him fast by the Collar. The

The Son of Law, for fuch he appeared to be, was going to open his Cafe at large, and in due Form, when HONESTY ftopp'd his Mouth; however, with much ftruggling, he mumbled out a Complaint, That, as PLAINTIFF, he had a Right to fpeak first-No, no, replies his enrag'd Antagonist, we'll have no PLAIN-TIFF nor DEFENDANT here; as you have fo often kick'd me out of WESTMINSTER HALL, I'll take Care to kick you out of the TEMPLE of VIRTUE, whither nothing but the matchlefs Impudence of a Pettifogger could have brought you. This Refolution was immediately put in effectual Execution, to the no fmall Amu'ement of VIRTUE, WISDOM, and TRUTH, all of whom had long known him for a declared Enemy.

During this concife Scuffle a Number of Characters preffed in, each eager to petition first; but still one interrupted the other—other-You come bere! cries one Female to her Neighbour, I wonder you are not ashamed to show yourself, when there are so many fubstantial Proofs that you never regarded VIRTUE-And what then, Madam METHODIST, retorts the Accufed, I have no Body to care for, no Body to answer to, but myself; I don't make a Cloak of RELI-GION and a HUSBAND to cover dark Deeds; I don't pray, and fing Hymns for an Hour or two, then cheat, tattle, and lye with a fanctified Phiz all the rest of the Day, as some of my pious Neighbours do.-This Encounter of two able Tongues promifed to be not only sharp but of confiderable Duration, had not a tefty old Fellow fnarled out-Phaw, phaw, here's Work with a Couple of babbling, gossipping Husses, that chatter away as if precious. TIME was only made for them to waste; but I, who know Economy better, and want to be in the Alley, can't wait trifling here; I must be dispatched immediately-You dispatched, old Turnpenny, cries

a young Smart-nothing but Sixpenny worth of Hemp should dispatch such a Grub as you. What can you possibly ask here? A Fellow, who, in the Midst of Abundance, starves himfelf and his Family, and over-reaches all he has any Dealings with-Aye, retorts the USURER, and if it comes to that, what brings you bere, Graceless? A prodigal Wretch, that squanders away his plentiful Fortune in Follies and Vices. Well, replies the Smart, and what then, old Multiplication, I make the World the better' for me, while you rob Mankind, and, as far as you have Power, stop the necessary Circulation; a few more such Scrapers would occasion a national Confumption.-This Altercation, like the former, promifed to extend a confiderable Length; but that the impatient Crowd grew fo vociferous, and recriminated against each other with fuch uncharitable and indecent Violence, that VIRTUE, WISDOM, and TRUTH, not being able to bear the Anarchy, afcended VOL. II. L thro' thro' the Roof of the TEMPLE; upon which the whole Edifice, and its rocky Foundation, falling with a mighty Crafh, overwhelmed the iniquitous Crowd in one juft and general Ruin.

After the TEMPLE of VIRTUE, which concluded with this Incident, we were entertained with a petit Piece, called the EUROPEANS*, written by BOLINGBROKE; which, according to the Translation, with the Characters, and who represented them, you will meet with in the fucceeding CHAPTER.

* The Reader is defired to remark that this, like the TEMPLE of VIRTUE, being only a Translation, cannot be expected to have the Spirit of an Original.

CHAP. VI.

Containing the feveral Scenes of the Euro-PEANS.

PERSONS in the EUROPEANS.

Baron Swizzle. Mynheer Vanderberring. Marquis de Capriole. Don Imperioso. Signor Feminiani. Sir Stedfast Hatebribe. Liberty 2 Queen Elizabeth

Liberty. } { Queen Elizabeth. Property. } { Afra Behn.

The Piece commenced with a Scene between Liberty and Property, as follows:

Lib. WELL, Property, am I not in a most troublefome Situation, fo many Admirers, and fo few Friends?

Prop. A very fad one, indeed, Madam; and I, your Handmaid, am in little better; no poor Creature was ever fo bandied L 2 about; * Who was behoaded in James the Second's Reign.

about; fome affault me with Force, fome with Fraud; fome poffefs me with as little Regard as they have for their Wives; others love fo intolerably that I can never have any Connexion with you; fome venture their Necks, fome their Souls; in fhort, I am the univerfal Game, and hunted in every Corner of the World.

Lib. Very true, Child, we are both in a most precarious Situation; you, indeed, are to be met, in full Health and Beauty, at fome Times, and in particular Places; but it is a Matter of very great Doubt whether I have at prefent, or ever had, any real Existence upon the Face of the Earth.

Prop. Oh yes, Madam, among the GREEKS and ROMANS you made a very great Figure.

Lib. I know it has been faid fo, but the Matter will admit of much Doubt; my my Nature is extremely nice, and my Composition elusive; there are two Monsters frequently mistaken for me, Luxury and Licentiousness.

Prop. What Family are they of, I pray?

Lib. Very near Relations of your own; the former most immediately derived from Monarchy or Aristocracy; the latter, from Democracy.

Prop. But how can fuch deform'd Monfters, Madam, possibly impose upon Mankind?

Lib. Merely thro' the Blindnefs and Prejudice of their own Paffions; luxurious Enjoyments lull the Great, and Licentioufnefs pleafes the Vulgar; the former know no Good beyond the Appendages of Grandeur, and the latter imagine themfelves fully poffeffed of me, L 3 when when they have unlimited Opportunities of abufing their Superiors.

Prop. Pray then, Madam, that I may never miftake you, give me fome fuch Out-lines as may preferve me from Delufion; for without you I must be in a very dangerous State.

Lib. Your Obfervation is juft, and your Requeft reafonable, therefore I shall fatiffy you in as few Words as possible: If you ever meet with a Nation where the upper Class study to protect and encourage the lower; where the Great fill Offices of Government for Public Good alone, without any pecuniary Profit; and where their Dependents gratefully conform to legal Regulations, not from Fear of Punishment, but from Conviction that Obedience is necessary to the general Happines; where Teachers of Reli-GION study to regulate the Morals, and not to trammel the Reafon of their Flocks; where the Military Genius is cultivated not to ferve ambitious Views, but to prevent foreign Invafion; and where Practitioners in Law prefer Juffice to Gain; there you may be fure to find me.

Prop. Truly, by this Defcription, and the Obfervations I have made, you may be long fought after in vain—Ah, Madam, I could wifh never to be feparated from you; I am always fafeft under your Protection; therefore I humbly requeft that, if you fix upon any of the SUITORS, who are this Day to follicit your Favour, you will caft an Eye upon your faithful humble Servant.

Lib. Doubt not my Friendship, Property; I shall be always glad to retain you in my Service; tho', between ourfelves, you often attach yourfelf very unworthily; however, you shall be present, and I give give you full Authority to fay what you can in your own Favour, without the leaft Referve.

Prop. That, Madam, is as much as I can poffibly expect—Soft, here comes a Vifiter.

Baron Swizzle.

Bar. Madam, the Imperial Eagle cow'ring at your Feet, by me follicits your honourable Alliance.

Lib. Ere you receive my Anfwer you must acquaint me, Sir, with those national Qualities which authorize this Address.

Bar. Is it possible your Ladyship can be unacquinted with the many and glorious Claims GERMANIA has to your Fayour?

Lib. Even fo, Sir, for I never remember to have been in that Country.

Bar.

Bar. Amazing! we are all extremely intimate with your Name, and I thought, Madam, you had been very frequently amongft us.

Lib. You are quite miltaken, I affure you; it often happens that those who talk of me most know me least; but let me hear the Pretensions of your Embasfy, and I shall give you an undifguised Answer.

Bar. Pretenfions, Madam, our Pretenfions lie in the moft brilliant Military Fame, in which we outfhine all the World; in the Perfon of our Imperial Parent, who prefides to hold a political Equilibrium among the feveral States; and in that Noble Diet which takes Cognizance of all public Grievances, and rectifies them: Add to thefe the many invincible Heroes who have fought, who have bled, who who have conquered, who have died in Defence of your Ladyship's Charms.

Prop. Ah, Madam, don't believe a Syllable this Fellow fays; for my Part, the wildeft Indians cannot attack me in a more barbarous Manner than his Countrymen.

Lib. Fear not, Child, fair Pictures cannot deceive me; to anfwer regularly, Sir, I muft take Notice that Military Fame, as it is purfued in your Clime, ftands forth my greateft Enemy; your Imperial Parent, as you ftile him, is an ineffectual Pageant of Power, not able to fupport me, tho' inclined to do fo; for every petty Prince, when he can link himfelf with any other, from whom he may derive Affiftance, fears not to oppofe him : The Diet, or National Affembly, you boaft, may now and then compromize fome fome trivial Disputes; but does it form a conftant Barrier between Oppreffion and fuffering Industry? You cannot fay fo: And as to those Heroes who have bled in my Defence, according to your Report, it is an errant Mistake; Fighting, among your Countrymen, is a Trade; your Sovereign Princes are many of them fo poor, that younger Sons must be fent into the Field of War for Maintenance, and a great Part of their indigent Subjects must become Soldiers for the fame Reafon : This dreadful Situation of Things makes it neceffary in every Court to hold Cabals, which may promote Action, that your mercenary Troops may be taken into Pay, and let loofe to plunder their Neighbours. Can you then call fuch as thefe my Defenders? However brave, however wife, however perfevering, fuch Inftruments difgrace rather than fupport the Name of Liberty; therefore, inftead of venturing myfelf into fo inhoinhofpitable a Seat of Depredation, I shall advife even my most distant Friends to have no Connexions with a thankless People, who know no Friendship beyond the immediate Call of Interest.

Bar. Madam, as Reprefentative of the illuftrious GERMANIC Body, I muft be bold to fay that you fpeak in Terms unworthy your own Delicacy and our Importance; therefore, unlefs you chufe to think better of it, I fhall publifh a Manifefto of the Indignity received, and doubt not but our Allies will affift to enforce Reafon.

Lib. Spoke with the true overbearing Spirit of your Country, the ultima ratio Regum; but think not I am to be intimidated by Threats, or gained by Force; both are fo repugnant to my Nature, that the very Mention of them removes me far from the Poffeffion of fuch Knight Errants

Errants as wooe in Thunder, and robe themfelves with Blood.

Bar. This is the first Time I ever knew that the Sons of Valour could be difagree-able to a Lady.

Lib. Nor would they, Sir, were Valour only fhewn in a just Caufe.

Bar. Well, Madam, I am forry it has been my Fortune to come upon fo unfuccefsful an Embaffy; however, take Notice, that whoever is favour'd with your Smiles, may chance to lament the Slights I have received.

Prop. Oh, Madam, I am rejoiced he's gone; the rough Bear threw me into a horrid Palpitation left he fhould have been downright rude.

Lib. Of that there was no Danger, for even my greatest Enemies preferve an external external Refpect—Oh, here comes another—You, Sir, are the Dutch Plenipo, I prefume?

Vanderherring.

Van. Your Ladyship's Difernment cannot err; by me the UNITED PROVINCES offer their Respects: It is well known that they shook off the Spanish Yoke out of an inviolable Attachment to you, and from thence we originally lay Claim to your Patronage.

Lib. And fo far, Mynheer, your Right is well founded; to difdain and caft off Oppreffion is the higheft Merit in my Sight; but has your future Conduct kept Pace with fuch a glorious Beginning?

Van. Madam, I hope it has; we have never fuffered Monarchy to creep upon us; indeed the STADTHOLDERSHIP feems to bear Superiority; but we have always taken Care to cramp it fo, that, upon due Exa-

[175]

Examination, it will be found little more than a Name: Add to this our unbounded Spirit of Trade, our national Œconomy, and that certain Confequence of both, our aftonifhing Opulence: With whom then can Liberty find a more pleafing Refidence?

Prop. Aye, Madam, this Gentleman talks to the Purpofe; I may venture to recommend him and his Countrymen as very particular Friends of mine.

Lib. I know that Recommendation, and fhall confider it with the reft.

Prop. Ply her clofe, and I warrant you, Mynheer. (Afide.)

Lib. At the Time of fhaking off the SPANISH Yoke, my Spirit animated the Caufe; I was amongft you; and in the Support of Republican Principles you have have shewn yourselves my Proselytes; but, avoiding SCYLLA, you have fallen into CHARIEDIS; you are not Slaves to Power but Avarice; Gain is the Tyrant that lords it over your Hearts, and directs all your Actions; how can you be free that are fo fwallowed up in the Gulph of private Property, as to render your State useless to Friends, and despicable to Foes? Individuals are opulent; the Government poor, irrefolute, and diffracted with Diffention. Temporizing and Evafion are your Policy; Encroachment and Monopoly, your Aim; Professions without Performance, your Practice. How then could I propofe to myfelf a Refidence of Pleafure or of Safety among those who, by every Method, are accumulating private Wealth to allure their ambitious Neighbours, and have no public Spirit to fecure Refpect: In a Country which is indebted to a neighbouring ISLAND for its Independence, and which could never have have fupported itfelf in the Midft of many envious Enemies, but through the continued Protection of fo powerful an Ally? which, notwithftanding, they have treated with fuch Ingratitude, that I fhould prove myfelf guilty of a Weaknefs little fhort of Self-deftruction, to rely upon any Promifes from you that were not bound with Gold.

Prop. Now, Mynheer, for a genteel Come-off, the Duтсн are famous that Way. (Afide.)

Van. Pardon me, Madam, if I prefume to fay that the Charge of Ingratitude to our Infular Friends is rather premature; they certainly have our good Wifhes, and they want no more; they are fufficient in themfelves to fupport the Neceffities of their State; why then fhould we run ourfelves into Difficulties and Perils to give them Affiftance? Your Ladyfhip cannot Vol. II. M but but know that Self-defence is the moft powerfulObligation; That, dulyfulfilled, we fhall be always ready to affift our very good Friends the ENGLISH.

Prop. Well faid, Sir, that will do. (Afide.)

Lib. I am not to learn, Mynheer, that Plaufibility is a Characteriftic of your Country; but tho' you may plead, that to grant your Friends Affiftance is unneceffary, pray how do you apologize for being fo induftrious to furnifh their Enemies with Materials offenfive and defenfive?

Van. As to that, Madam, we make no Difference; Trade will ever follow the beft Market; and as Trade is our Support, it is natural enough to carry Merchandize where it will have the quickeft Sale, without any unfriendly Meaning: Befides, Madam, we fhould not not be placed entirely on the Debtor Side; pray, did not we do you and ENGLAND very fignal Service in fending over our PRINCE of ORANGE to refcue you from Popifh Tyranny?

Lib. Had that been a national Piece of Friendship, it would have cancell'd many Faults; but your Countrymen wanted to get WILLIAM out of the Way, who was too great and good not to have many Enemies, tho' he preferved your State from Ruin; and the PRINCE was as defirous of leaving a thankless People, who always cramp'd his Operations, and strove to fully his Fame; hence the happy REvolution in my Favour appears, with respect to you, rather the Child of Chance than of Friendship.

Van. Are you then determined to reject my Solicitation ?

Lib. Most certainly.

Van. Why then it is in vain to multiply Words and lofe Time; look you, Madam, we have hitherto been able to make the lower Clafs of People believe you refided conftantly amongft us, which anfwers the fame End as if you was really on the Spot; nay, to my Thinking, much better; for you feem to have fuch confcientious Scruples about Friendfhip, and Gratitude, and public Spirit, that I think you would be a very troublefome Gueft, fo e'en fix where you will for Vanderberring: HOLLANDERS know better than to prefer Shadows to Subftance, fo farewell.

Prop. I profes, Madam, I cannot help thinking you too fcrupulous.

Lib. There it is; like the Generality of Females, you are prejudiced in Favour of the most affiduous Lovers, tho' the Affection of such is feldom sound or permanent; but I must be more cautious, for a voluntary Surrender on my Side would bring Ruin upon all my Friends; your Cafe is different, becaufe being entirely valued for your Influence, where that prevails most you will naturally like to be.

Prop. Very true; but I like your Ladyfhip's Service fo much, that I could wifh never to leave it.

Lib. Your Defire is reafonable, but vain; the Nature of human Affairs will not fuffer us to be often or long together, left we fhould too firmly fix the Power of my poor unfettled Sifter HAPPINESS.

Prop. If that be the Cafe, Madamfoft, I'm interrupted.

Marquis de Capriole.

Marq. Madam, I'm thrice three Times your Ladyship's most obedient and devoted humble Servant; the Brilliancy of M 3 your your angelic Charms must counterwork your Name and Nature, and captivate all Beholders.

[182]

Lib. Your Country, Monfieur Marquis, is a Soil fruitful in Compliments.

Marq. Right, Madam, Politeness is the Characteristic of FRANCE; a Country famous also for every great and amiable Qualification.

Lib. True, Sir, if we take your Opinion of the Matter.

Marq. My Opinion! Your Ladyship cannot but know the Truth of my Affertion from incontestible Evidence; why, Is not ours the leading Language in Europe? Do not our Fashions regulate the general Taste, and are we not a Terror to all the furrounding States?

Lib. If you call this latter Influence worthy or amiable, I am yet to learn the true true Meaning of those Terms; and let me tell you, that the Influence of your Language and Fashions is more owing to a ridiculous and fervile Complaifance in other Nations, than to any real Worth in themselves.

Marq. Politively your Ladyship differs widely from all the polite Female World, which must be owing to fome Prejudice; but, to remove the Cloud from before your bright Eyes, let me invite you to that fecond EDEN, VERSAILLES; where Beauty meets with higher Regard and more Adoration than on any other earthly Spot.

Lib. What Beauty, my Lord?—The Beauty of falfe Appearances? How is it poffible that I, who always fhow my own Face, and fpeak just as I think, fhould make a tolerable Figure where all the Females wear masquerade Faces, and all the Men fallacious Hearts?

Marq.

Marq. Thefe Matters, Madam, you take merely from Report; Experience, no Doubt, would foften this moft unfavourable Profpect—'Tis true our Ladies, from a Defire to pleafe, and confcious that Nature is liable to a precipitate Decay, do apply external Ornament; and certainly, where Features want Bloom to enliven, or White to render them delicate, Reafon allows Art to be commendable.

Lib. By the fame Rule, Sir, Reafon might place Affection upon a beautified Moppet: This ftrong Attachment to artificial Charms, fhows that your very polite Nation pays little Regard to intrinfic Worth, and feldom looks fo far as the Heart, where only real Beauty is to be found; for which Reafon we view your Females, in general, as we do Buildings of gaudy, outward Show, without any Marks of Tafte, Convenience, or Richnefs within.

Marq.

Marq. Well, Madam, fuppofe this fhould be the Cafe, (which, however, I cannot be unnatural enough to admit) your Appearance must be with the greater Eclat; and tho' you should be envied by the Women, you are fure of being fole Arbitrefs among the Men.

Lib. Then I must not come near the Court, for there dwell my most inveterate Enemies; look ye, my Lord, Flattery, the usual Female Bait, won't do here; Openness of Expression and Sincerity of Heart are much stronger Recommendations to me; you are, it must be allowed, a plaufible People, prodigal in Profession, penurious in Performance; placid in Looks, defigning in Action; fond of Military Fame, regardlefs of honefty: Your Court is a Fountain of Diffimulation, which fpreads Infection thro' all Ranks of People; the Root of Oppression, which fhoots forth Branches thro' each Department ment of Government; and a Magazine of Combustion to fet the World on Fire; how then can you have the Affurance to folicit my Prefence? You fay Prejudice misleads me; 'tis false, I have visited your Country incog. feveral Times, and have wept Tears of Blood over the enflaved Millions I faw there; I did but peep abroad in the Perfon of HENRY IV. and a RAVILLIAC was foon found to stab me; fince then I have ventured occafionally into your Parliaments; but each fucceeding Grand Monarque has watched fo clofe, and fo affiduoufly compaffed my Deftruction, that common Prudence forbids me even to enter into fo hoftile a Climate.

Marq. I dare fay, Madam, our prefent Grand Monarque, were you to enter upon a Negotiation, would fhow himfelf much lefs your Enemy than you imagine.

Lib. Aye, there it is; your Succefs in Negotiations has been fo extraordinary at different different Times, that you would lead me into the Road of Imposition; but I am prepared against all the Powers of Infinuation, being very well affured that French Fidelity has but an imaginary Exiftence, and that those who have least Dependence upon it are most likely to remain in Safety; befides, my Lord, had you been at all acquainted with me, you must have known that my Nature and Conftitution are diametrically opposite to the overbearing Power of any Monarch upon Earth; it is an Abfurdity to imagine I should coop myself within the Limits of one Man's Will.

Marq. Your Ladyship here again, pardon my Freedom, confiders the Matter in a partial Light; where can you share Power or Royal Favour to more Advantage than in an Union with the FRENCH MONARCH, who can cast never-dying Laurels

Laurels at your Feet, and grace your Brows with Beams of unrivall'd Glory.

Lib. Thefe, Sir, are Ornaments of trifling Value to Liberty, who difdains all the oftentatious Gifts of arbitrary Power; who has no true Enjoyment but in the undiftinguifhed Happinefs of a whole People; in the mild and impartial Diftribution of neceffary Laws; and in the tendereft Impofition of indifpenfible Taxes; as thefe Points cannot be hoped for in a political Conftitution like yours, it is, I fay again, vain and abfurd to defire my Prefence.

Marq. Give me Leave, Madam, to remark, that, when I undertook this Embaffy, I expected more Refpect to my Country, and the dignified Character of its Reprefentative; but your fecret Attachment to a certain ISLAND is well known, and, like other Female Follies, may beget Repentance; while GALLIC Power

Power and Fame, unincumber'd with those dark and heavy Prejudices which feem to govern you, shall tower beyond your Reach, and foar to Immortality.

Lib. Ha! Monfieur the Marquis has dropp'd his cool philosophical Politenes.

Prop. No Wonder, Madam, for you anatomized his frippery Nation pretty feverely; and Diffimulation detected, among French Politicians, always turns to Rhodomontade.

Lib. No Female, fure, was ever tormented with fuch Suitors.

Prop. Nor any Suitors, Madam, better match'd in a peremptory Miftrefs; Soothing and Threats, Smiles and Frowns, feem all alike to you.

Lib. Seem! nay, they really are fo, I affure you; yet, for all this, I could wifh myfelf myself in an agreeable and permanent Situation.

Prop. And I too, Madam; well, who knows, one of those to come may possibly deferve your Favour.

Lib. If that fhould be the Cafe, depend upon it I fhall not be over nice in my Choice, nor too rigid in the Articles of Settlement—Oh, here comes the formal SPANIARD, confident in his own vaft Importance.

Don Imperiofo.

Don Imp. It is with Pleafure, Madam, I approach you as the Reprefentative of SPAIN; Pleafure founded upon probable Affurance that you, who have had Difcernment and Prudence to reject the indigent GERMAN, the avaricious Hol-LANDER, and the fantaftic GAUL, will liften with Condefcention to my fuperior Claim.

Lib.

Lib. No Doubt, my Lord, an Audience is as much your Right as that of any who came before you, and you may expect an equal Impartiality.

Don Imp. On that I fhall reft Succefs: 'Tis not unknown to your Ladyfhip that our Nation laboured fome Ages under the Difgrace and Hardfhip of Moorifh Captivity; yet, at a Time when we feemed loft beyond Redemption, an inextinguifhable Regard for you roufed our great Forefathers from their flavifh Lethargy, fo enflamed their Hearts, and fo nerved their Arms, that a total Extirpation of the Infidels enfued, IBERIA once again fhining like herfelf.

Lib. My Lord, I remember the great Event with particular Satisfaction, as it is my peculiar Nature to wifh every Nation the full Poffeffion of its natural Rights, and an Exemption from all foreign and domeftic Oppreffion.

Don

Don Imp. Truly great and amiable; no Place on Earth, but that Nation I reprefent, can do Juftice to fuch exalted Worth; let me then, Madam, lead you thither, and lay the amazing Treasures of both INDIES at your Feet.

Lib. Alas! vain Man, were there no other Objection, what thou haft now mentioned as an Inducement would alone deter me-The INDIES! I turn my Eyes on them with Horror-You mentioned the Moorish Captivity as an Hardfhip; did they, though branded with the Name of Infidels, fo wantonly and cruelly ufe the Iron Rod of Power amongft you as your Forefathers did among the unpractifed, unfuspecting INDIANS? Did they in cold Blood, with fair Faces too, cut off Thousands for the Sake of curfed Gold? What Right had your Difcoverers, driven by Chance among the unhappy MEXICANS and PERUVIANS, to meditate ditate and profecute their Deftruction? Providence had given them their Country as a natural Inheritance, what Privilege had your Cortes and Pizzarro rapacioully to deprive them of it? Superior Power should have taught you Mercy: If you had more Wifdom you fhould have pitied their Weaknefs, and not impofed upon it; you fhould have taught them Commerce, and not inftructed them in the Arts of Inhumanity and Plunder; their Right to Life and Independence is as inconteftible, and ought to be held as facred, as that of the most polished Nations; and nothing but the most illiberal Partiality could fligmatize them as Barbarians for afferting those Rights, and refenting the Infringement of them.

Don Imp. But, Madam, in the Caufe of Religion we cannot be too warm.

Lib. Religion! what Religion? The CHRISTIAN? Mildnefs and Perfusion Vol. II. N are are the Means fhe ufes, and the only Means fhe juftifies; but you, with Intereft to infpire your Zeal, array'd her in Frowns and Terrors; even your own internal Policy exhibits her with the most gloomy Afpect; Pride, Oftentation, Indolence, and Enthusiafm are the reigning Characteristics through all Degrees of People, which render my Refidence among you utterly impracticable.

Don Imp. But, Madam, if you are to be received on the moft friendly Terms, and to hold equal State with the higheft Ranks in our antient Kingdom, fome Defects may be overlooked.

Lib. Farther Solicitation is in vain; I cannot be happy at the Expence of others, nor felfifhly enjoy the Smiles of Comfort, when Wretchedness appears on every Side.

Don

[195]

Don Imp. Wretchednefs, Madam! Happinefs and Mifery take their Rife from Comparifon; thofe who have neverknown better are content with the humbleft Enjoyments of Life; artificial Paffions, both in a national Capacity and a domeftic one, are created by an improper Indulgence; this our political Conftitution prevents, by maintaining a juft Subordination, from whence only can be derived the effential Refpect to ennobled Characters.

Lib. Aye, there, my Lord, you have faid the whole; your Nobility fuppoling themfelves to be made of fuperior Materials, confider the lower Ranks as mere Utenfils for the Support of their Pride and Convenience. This Kind of Subordination I pronounce Slavery, nor will I ever come where Priefts tread upon the King, and the King upon the Nobles, and the Nobles trample the People underfoot.

Don

Don Imp. Madam, 'tis well; but take Notice that Obftinacy may bring late Repentance; you have been treated with Refpect and Cordiality; fince thefe will not prevail, united to my Coufin FRANCE by a FAMILY COMPACT, we fhall, I doubt not, reduce your Ladyfhip to Terms lefs advantageous than you might have obtained by mild Negotiation.

Prop. Oh, dear Madam, I tremble to think of this Spaniard's becoming your Enemy, you know what a vindictive People they are.

Lib. I know them well, they never were my Friends; therefore I have loft nothing, nor will I fear their becoming Tools to their ambitious Neighbours, which muft be the whole Effect of their FAMILY COMPACT; a Defign more likely to do me Good than Harm, unlefs all other States should become totally indifferent, or blind to their own Welfare. There

[197]

There are certain Bounds in political Connexions, to pass which creates Envy and Danger; such, if I mistake not, their Combination will prove.

Signior Feminiani.

Fem. I efteem myfelf happy, Madam, in being appointed the Inftrument of Mediation between your Ladyfhip and ITALY the Bleffed; a Clime moft favoured by Providence in the Temperature of its various Seafons; a Nation fo improved by Art, fo beautified by Tafte, and fo enriched by Elegance, that Travellers view us with Amazement.

Lib. 'Tis true, Signior, but the Admiration and Regard of most Travellers are not bent upon Places and Things of greatest Consideration, real Value cannot be determined by their Passions.

Fem. Suppofe not, Madam, yet undoubtedly Rome and its adjacent Coun-N 3 tries tries have commanded Refpect thro' the Annals of many Ages.

Lib. Once, I admit, the Inhabitants of your Country defervedly found an exalted Place in the Records of FAME; but the former Luftre strikes a Shade from the prefent degenerate Sons of ROME; who, with flavish Ignorance, submit to the abfurd Dominion of a proud Churchman, and his Council of full-gorg'd Ecclefiaftics, who fupport Religion by Oftentation and temporal Authority, not by Scripture or Reafon; who themfelves hold fast the Goods of this World, while they delude their unhappy Flock with fhadowy Promifes; or terrify them with impious Threats, in regard of a future Existence, as if the Supreme Director had referved no Power to himfelf, but the mere Ratification of their Absolutions or Anathemas: No more then mention what ROME was, feeing how changed fhe is, and how miferably fallen. Fem.

Fem. This is a Point, Madam, we are taught never to difcufs too nicely, the Confequence is dangerous.

Lib. And therein are ye the greateft of all Slaves; why were fuch noble Faculties implanted in the human Mind, if not to confider and digeft whatever relates to its Dignity and Intereft? Why has the UNIVERSAL PARENT made it free, if Man ufurps the Power of tyrannizing over it; but as I know the Stubbornnefs of rooted Prejudices, I fhall enlarge no farther upon this Topic; and befides thefe I have many other Objections to reliding amongft you.

Fem. Is it poffible, Madam, that you fhould diflike a Country where the Elegance and Dignity of Architesture commands Attention, and imparts the most elevated Pleasure; where Canvas, glowing with the masterly Labours of so many excellent Artists, calls up, alternately, every Pas-

Paffion of the human Heart; and where Mufic's powerful Voice, in Strains little fhort of celeftial Harmony, raifes the enchanted Soul to the Abodes of Blifs.

Lib. Thefe, Sir, as agreeable and wonderful Efforts of human Genius, I admire; and would always, under the Influence of Reafon, cultivate them with Care; but must at the fame Time confider them only asOrnaments, not Effentials of Humanity. WISDOM and VIRTUE, the true Beautifiers of the Nature and the Life of Man, are very feldom found amongft you; you fubstitute that poor Phantom TASTE for the folid Principles of Morality; you are not only Slaves to your Superiors, but Slaves to your own Paffions; your licentious Effeminacy renders you contemptible, and your entire Devotion to Externals, worthlefs; return then, and know that LIBERTY difdains the Friendship of those who worfhip Shadows for Substances; and and either do not know, or will not regard, the intrinfic Worth of a well-governed and well-cultivated Mind.

Fem. O rude and Gothic Notion of Things! truly, if your Ladyship is of this Way of Thinking, you are too rough, too untractable for the Delicacy of our Southern Climes; and it will be much more agreeable to report your Answer, however ungenteel, than to introduce fo great an Enemy to the polite Arts.

Prop. What, the fmooth and gay Ita-lian gone alfo; at this Rate, Madam, I do not find that any Suitor is like to win your Efteem.

Lib. There is but another, how he may recommend himfelf, I know not yet; here he comes, and feems to carry fome Prepofferfion in his Appearance.

Sir

Sir Stedfast Hatebribe.

Sir Sted. Madam, my plain Manner of Addrefs, without any Affiftance from external Ornament or Equipage, may appear ill adapted to the Occafion; but, in my Mind, Refpect fhows itfelf to more Advantage without fuch flimzy oftentatious Appendages; I am, I hope, an honeft ENGLISHMAN, and in that exalted Character prefer my Solicitations.

Lib. You could not have named one more agreeable. Pray, Sir, of what Family are you?

Sir Sted. A Family, Madam, but little known, and not very numerous, that of the HATEBRIBES.

Lib. Are you of that valuable Stock? It is a Name I know and honour.

' Sir Sted. So I hope, for we have always been moft inviolably attached to your Lady-

[203]

Ladyship; that implacable Enemy of yours, CORRUPTION, has taken great Pains to win us over; PROTEUS never tried a greater Variety of Shapes; fometimes like a Lord of the Treasury, and then as one of Trade; a Secretary of State, or of War; a Commissioner of the Customs, or of the Excise; a Bishop, or a Judge; a General, or a Pensioner; yet all in vain : We have always fpoken as we thought, and done as we faid; we never bent the fawning Knee to Power; nor facrificed the Intereft of our Fellow-Subjects to promote ou. own: Indeed we have often ftruggled to no Purpofe; but if you, Madam, would. fix your conftant Refidence amongft us, the Glory of BRITAIN must shine with unrivalled Luftre, and our Happiness furpafs that of any other Nation upon Earth.

Lib. I agree in your Opinion, and no Perfon can have a more friendly Inclination towards BRITAIN than myfelf; it is a Country where, tho' I have at different Times

Times met with fome ill Ufage, many fteady Friends have exerted themfelves in my Caufe, and my Caftle of Magna Charta has always proved a fafe Retreat; yet 'tis true there are many Circumftances in the Political Conftitution very unpromifing to my Happinefs, if not totally inconfiftent with it.

Sir Sted. I am fenfible, Madam, of too many Defects; however, if you will make me acquainted with those you confider as most offensive, I will represent them to your Well-wishers, and no doubt they will use all honest Endeavours to rectify them.

Lib. So will they merit and obtain my Favour: To enumerate all the Particulars which give me Pain, would fwell the Catalogue to a tedious Length; let it fuffice to fay, that I feel a particular Grief at the enormous Multiplicity of Laws, which rather tend to obfcure than difpenfe Juffice; a Multiplicity which feems to fay fay that your Parliaments have been fludious to eftablish and promote a Trade, or a Profession which derives its chief Advantage from inextricable Principles; and furnishes so many evalive Windings to a crafty and litigious Adversary, that Honessing from him, can fcarce work its Way thro' the dangerous Labyrinth, unless Wealth becomes its Guide.

Sir Sted. Truly, Madam, I have often lamented this Cafe myfelf; but, by Neglect and Accumulation, our Laws are become an Augean Stable, in which nothing lefs than an Herculean Reformer could accomplifh the neceffary Change.

Lib. I fear it would require an HER-CULES indeed, while there are fo many interefted Defenders of their prefent State; yet I will not defpair, a truly independent SENATE would be truly patriotic; and to fuch a Body the framing ufeful Laws, and enforcing a due Execution of them, must be the first and most interesting Point of Confideration.

Sir Sted. The Friends of your Ladyfhip would undoubtedly act upon fuch Principles; but I am forry to reflect that, while fo many Placemen are chofen Reprefentatives of the People, Government and its Dependencies must have a prejudicial Influence.

Lib. That Complaint, I know, is general and juft; yet an eafy Remedy lies in the Power of those who complain: It has been proposed to obtain an Ast, which might exclude Servants of the Government from Places in the National Assembly; but how can such a Law be hoped for, while these constitute the Majority in that Assembly; nay, why should it be fought for, when a much easier and more effectual Remedy is in the Hands of the Electors?

Sir Sted. That, Madam, I should be glad to know. Lib.

Lib. Your Principles intitle you to know every Thing which tends to the Good of your Country. Let every Place then which deputes a Reprefentative, at the Time of Election exact a Promife, upon Honour, that the Perfon chofen fhould not, on any Pretence whatever, accept a Place or Penfion. If it were poffible that fuch a Reprefentative could afterwards violate his Integrity, a Law now exifting would vacate his Seat, and his Conftituents would have an undeniable Argument for rejecting a Perfon fo void of Truth and Honour.

Sir Sted. The Practicability, as well as general Ufe of this Hint, Madam, ftrikes me; but then it faid that, without fome Profeffors to inftruct our Law-givers in the different Branches of political Knowledge, the Senate must ever be imperfect.

Lib. Not at all; a Military Council might be appointed to prepare all Matters ters relative to the Army, for Parliamentary Ratification; another for the Navy; and fo on through all the other Departments of public Affairs. Befides, the Aristocratic Influence in your Government is hateful to me: Your PEERS, not content with forcing all their Sons and Relations into the Lower House, point out other Perfons to be chosen by the People; and, in the Character of Landlords, Lords of Manors, &c. proceed even to compel Electors into Compliance with their Recommendation, by threatening to deprive Dependents and Tenants of their Bread, who refuse to proftitute their Votes to them; and all this in direct Oppolition to that effential Law of the Constitution, that a PEER is by no Means to enter into, or influence, the Election of a Member of the Commons. I am not, as fome have misrepresented me, an Enthufiast; but this unfufferable Intrusion overbears all Patience.

Sir

Sir Sted. No Wonder, Madam, as from this our Conftitution and your Intereft are likely to receive the most dangerous Wound.

Lib. Nor does my Uneafines ftop here: No one can respect Royal Prerogative more than I do, fo far as it sheds real Dignity upon the Monarch; which Effect it cannot have, unlefs the Nation's Happiness is included in it. The Power of proroguing Parliaments appears to me in the Light of a dangerous and cenfurable Privilege; a PRINCE should undoubtedly have the Power of fummoning the National Council upon any Emergency; but its Recefs from public Bufinefs, and its stated Times of Meeting, fhould lie in the Determination of its own Members : Had that been the Cafe, CHARLES the FIRST would not have had the unhappy Privilege of enraging his Subjects, and of ruining himfelf; nor, under fuch a Regulation, could any STATESMAN, confcious of Crimes and VOL. II. ()Mif-

Mifdemeanors, fo eafily frame the Means to fcreen himfelf from public Refentment: You will find that every blundering or corrupt MINISTER, whofe Infamy is immortalized in Hiftory, has taken Advantage of this Privilege in the PRINCE to gain Time for his Defence and Security.

Sir Sted. Even fo, Madam; and we have another pretty Afylum too for fuch hunted Foxes when they are almost run down, the Shelter of Nobility with a Penfion; but I dare fay your Friendship and Perfeverance, granted to the Solicitation of unbiaffed Friends, together with their difinterested Attention, will in Time remedy fome, if not remove all the Grievances that have been mentioned.

Lib. So glorious a Prospect, joined to my natural Affection for BRITAIN, fires me; nor shall some unavoidable Insults deter me from giving you my Hand in Friendship; my Companion PROPERTY too too shall attend my Steps, and, if there should not be Knaves or Fools enough to banish us, it is in our Power to create you Respect abroad and Happiness at home.

Sir Sted. Madam, I glory more in obtaining this Condefcenfion, than if I had been cover'd with Laurels gather'd from the Conqueft of a World; I am happy in reflecting that, when I lead you to my Country as a Friend, I give her the greateft Bleffing fhe can enjoy.

Prop. Madam, I give your Ladyship Joy of fo prudent and agreeable a Choice.

Lib. I hope it may prove fo in its lateft and most remote Effects; come then, my Friend and Companion, let us proceed without Fear or Suspicion, fince we cannot have a better Guardian nor a fafer Guide than an uncorrupt and uncorruptible BRITON.

Here

Here ended the EUROPEANS; a Piece formed upon general Hints, and therefore better calculated to fet the Mind at Work upon the feveral Subjects, than perfectly to gratify it.

The Audience feparated, and the Volume ends: There remains no Room for the Criticifms that paffed between the NAMREDAL, Queen ELIZABETH, SHAKESPEAR, and Sir HUMPHREY, upon the Dramatic Action of NOIBLA, which gave Occafion to many Strictures upon that of our World.-Much curious Matter alfo, of various Nature, is left untold, and many Kingdoms of the Moon are yet unvifited; if you like your Journey, my Fellow-Travellers, when the Seafon for renewing our Expedition returns again, I shall not fail to meet you; and in the mean Time I heartily wifh you all the Good you wish yourselves.

The End of the Second Volume.
